At Blantyre, Lanarkshire, Scotland, where this famous man was born, March 19, 1813, a monument is to be erected to the "weaver boy," who has shed such luster on the town. In Edinburg the Episcopal bishop presided at a meeting held with reference to a monument in that city. The University of Glasgow, his "alma mater," is to have new scholarships bearing his name. Of all these posthumous honors the simple-hearted great man thought as little as of being buried in the great abbey. "He was a missionary," said Dean Stanley, "fashioned for the work by the special gifts of the Creator." "All his wanderings," said Sir Bartle Frere to the Royal Geographical Society, "were persistent workings toward one great end, which he sought with unflinching courage and perseverance. The Christianization of Africa, and the suppression of the slave trade as a means thereto, this was his passion. 'This continent,' he said, 'must be civilized from within outwards.'" Always a missionary, however great and renowned as a traveler. In the long line of brave and consecrated Christian toilers who will yet save Africa—many of them dark men and women from our Southern colleges and normal schools—what loving reverence there will be for the grand pioneer and forerunner of them all, David Livingstone!

Mingled with his last pains and prayers was this simple and moving expression: "I am going home." Yes, "home," fearless, tireless saint! Christian hero! Worn out for Africa and England and science and religion, go home. But what would have been his thought had he foreseen that while the cedar-sceuted shell with his wasting dust should be moving across the waves toward English soil, angry objections would be made in England to a national burial? Dissenters cannot have the respect that is paid to the most worthless "Churchman" in English cemeteries, however noble they may be; and the burials bill in Parliament for the righting of this mean wrong hangs in doubt. An English dean, with the virtue of indifference, permits a grave to Livingstone at Westminster; and, since none can be buried there save by the authorities, conducts the service as for a supposititious member of the national church. But High Churchmen make characteristic protest. "He lived and died a Presbyterian," says one of these in the Church Herald, "He had forsaken the faith of his forefathers, and associated himself with a sect which (on a par with Dissenters in England,) from having no divinely appointed ministers or teachers, can have but one available sacrament, that of baptism. (Which on the episcopal theory can be performed by laymen!) Such an one, then, at his decease, ought to find no place in Westminster Abbey. As well might we inter there the Sultan of Turkey, his majesty of Ashantee or the King of the Cannibal Islands." Hero are "sweetness and light!" And Livingstone is "the first missionary, if not the first Nonconformist as such," whom that place of honor has ever known, though there is "a modest little bust of Dr. Watts, the only monument to an eminent Nonconformist in the abbey." Has the English Church or the English episcopate or the archiepiscopate a name to put above that of Livingstone?

The offense is rank—it smells to heaven.—Advance.

Southern Presbyterian General Assembly.

This body met in Columbus, Mississippi, in May. Concerning some of its proceedings the Southwestern Presbyterian says:

On Thursday the report of the committee on foreign correspondence was presented by Dr. Kirkpatrick. It recommended the appointment of a committee of conference, in compliance with the request of the Northern Assembly, to meet their committee, with a view to confer in reference to establishing closer and more fraternal relations between the two bodies. It is a very able document.

Judge Fontress presented a minority report, advocating a negative reply, on the ground that our position was already defined on this question by the action of the Louisville Assembly, and that we ought not to recede from it. He supported this position by able arguments, which were cut short by the ten minutes rule adopted by the Assembly at the close of the previous debate. The matter was considered next day, but the mind of the Assembly was made up to adopt the majority report without debate, and the ten minutes limitation was insisted on—a limitation which seemed unfair, as it did not allow the minority an opportunity to fairly put their argument before the body. But the minority being remarkably good natured, did not make as much opposition as they probably ought to have done, and contented themselves with bringing in a protest next morning, signed by the moderator and others. The committee, however, is unobjectionable. It consists of Dr. William Brown, of Richmond, Virginia; Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans; Dr. Farris, of St. Louis; Judge Inglis, of Baltimore, and B. M. Estes, of Tennessee. If any one could be trusted we can trust them.

This committee was appointed by the moderator. When Dr. Palmer's name was announced on it, Dr. H. M. Smith stated that he had been requested to say that, if Dr. Palmer was put upon that committee, it must be with a distinct understanding that none of his views upon the questions at issue had changed.

A member then proposed that he should be allowed to withdraw from the committee. The Assembly refused to allow this, and the committee was elected by a rising vote of the Assembly, two persons voting in the negative.

Another matter of a good deal of interest was brought before us in the form of an overture from the Northern Assembly to take steps with a view to form a council representing the various Presbyterian bodies of the world. It was advocated by Dr. Plumer, chairman of the committee to whom the matter was referred.

The Assembly, however, decided by a handsome majority that it could not recognize the principle of an irresponsible alliance, and so the matter was disposed of by a polite failure to accept the invitation.

Some very important business was done at this session. A plan was adopted for establishing the colored people in a separate church organization; and also the plan of raising the commissioners' and contingent fund by an assessment of ten cents per member, which will be sufficient.

What They Say About It.

We give extracts, at such length as our space permits, from our Northern Methodist exchanges concerning the action of the General Conference on the subject of fraternity.

The New York Christian Advocate:

It was, perhaps, in the usual order of such business that the message of our delegates was referred to a committee, that a proper response might be prepared. It was, however, remarkable, and not ominous of good, that the report of that committee was so long delayed. Our delegates were unable to await its coming, and were dismissed, very politely, but without knowing what the response would be. It was well that they were spared the pain of hearing it presented. At length, however, the committee's labor of two weeks appeared, as we present it on our second page. That it has disappointed the heart of both the churches, and dashed hopes that were springing up in many bosoms, both North and South, cannot be doubted. And yet we are not very much surprised. With the spirit manifested in the earlier stages of the affair, we were encouraged to trust that the old leaven of asperity had been largely purged out, but even then we feared, and the event proves that our misgivings were not without just cause. As we give the report in full, our readers may read and judge of it for themselves. To us its matter seems to be historically incorrect in many particulars; but that is the least objectionable part of the paper; its taste and evident animus are especially its damaging features.

The debates show how the matter was viewed by not a few of the ablest and best men in the body. They show, alike forcibly and truthfully, that the committee traveled beyond their proper duty in discussing in such a paper the early history of the separation, and subsequent unpleasant relations of the two bodies; that to define anew their relations to slavery, and to reiterate their unchanged convictions as to the scripturalness of their views, were alike uncalled for and tending to offensiveness; and that any reference to the organic union of the two bodies as impossible and undesirable was not only "gratuitous" (as stated by one of themselves,) but also, and for that reason, impertinent. It was scarcely necessary to repel an advance that had not been made, and that nobody intended. Saying nothing about the propriety of such a paper in other connections—which, however, we doubt—nor of the ability with which it is drawn up—which may be granted—we must consider it, as it stands, a most unfortunate affair for its authors and for the whole body which made it its own. And while it may occasion real sorrow on our part, the affair puts us in the right before God, our own consciences and the whole world.

The Northwestern Christian Advocate, Chicago:

We are convinced, by the debates and votes yonder, as well as by other unmistakable signs, that the rank and file of Southern Methodist ministers and laymen are in favor of full fraternity with us. Those sixty-five in the minority would not have voted thus unless they were sure of a large popular following at home. That aggregate General Conference vote of one hundred and sixty-eight represents about six hundred thousand church members in the South. The majority of one hundred and three represent about three hundred and seventy-five thousand members, and the minority of sixty-five represent about two hundred and twenty-five thousand members. On this minimum basis we plant hopes of a thorough and speedy adjustment of all differences between the two churches, and a better day is not far distant. And, moreover, that unfortunate majority report was adopted by only about one-third of the Southern Conference. Many of the members had either gone home or were absent from an unwillingness to vote on the unfraternal document.

The immediate outcome of this will be qualified fraternity, and its mediate, unqualified fraternal relations. We fearlessly and confidently predict that the Louisville General Conference, though it may somewhat delay full fraternal relations, will, by reaction and philosophical ministration, hasten organic union by a decade. Mark that. We will have peace if we must fight for it—with spiritual weapons.

The Central Christian Advocate, St. Louis:

We watched day by day for the appearance of the report of the committee appointed to prepare a paper in response to the greeting. And we were not disappointed with the report when it was presented. For any one who had knowledge of the past feeling, and the present position of the leading organs of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, could not be ignorant of their sentiments. There are, without doubt, many persons in each church who look forward to organic union at some distant day, but there is no party in either church which advocates it now. But to a large number in the South the idea is distasteful, and keeps them from favoring fraternity, lest a step in this direction should seem to make a presumption in favor of union. Then the actual differences in feeling and thought between the churches have been magnified by the old indisposition to forgive and forget.

The report, as it was passed, doubtless expresses the real conviction and feeling of the majority of the convention. It is not all that we could have desired, and does not convey the same measure of fraternity that was offered by our General Conference. But it was not an occasion for sentiment, and the report would have been of no value had it not been frank. The position of the minority comes more nearly to our view of what would have given the greatest degree of satisfaction. The second resolution authorizes the Bishops to appoint a commission to meet a similar commission from our church to adjust the difficulties which the majority declare, stand in the way of satisfactory fraternal relations. Had some one moved that it follow the portion of the report to which it refers, and that the first resolution stand by itself at the end of the second portion of the report, the situation would have simplified, both portions could have passed by a nearly unanimous vote, and a more exact statement of the intention of the Conference would have been obtained. But, as it was, the lack of harmony brought out an expression of fraternity and good will from some of the older members that we could ill afford to lose. Drs. Lee, Regester, Head and Sehon spoke for a great company whose hearty Christian fraternity otherwise would not have found such ample expression, and they have our thanks.

We have no delicacy in saying that we take exceptions to several matters set forth in the historical statement of differences, and shall give attention to them in due time. We shall especially take occasion to discuss the points at issue in regard to the "Plan of Separation," and the refusal to recognize Dr. Lovick Pierce as a fraternal delegate in 1848. We acknowledge that there are two sides to these questions; otherwise a commission would scarcely be necessary.

The historical portion of the report has one feature that gives us real satisfaction. It contains a clear and fair statement of the efforts that have been put forward by our church officials, for some years past, to establish a better understanding with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The people of the South will see that we have let no opportunity pass. Some of our people have thought that we were too persistant in the matter, considering the style in which our advances were received. But we had no other thought than to heal the breach and restore good feeling.

We believe that none will ever have reason to regret the steps that have been taken. The "two Methodisms" are nearer to each other than they were a month ago. Time adjusts difficulties and differences, that even grace seems unable to contend with. But we look to the increased spirituality which God is pouring out upon all the churches as the chief element in harmonizing the conflicts which have grown up in thought and feeling between the churches.

The New York Methodist, on "Fraternity all Around," says:

The movements in favor of organic union, by which several branches of the church have been affected, within the last four years, do not seem to have made extraordinary progress this year. But there is disclosed in the proceedings of nearly all the assemblies which have thus far met a decided advance toward the cultivation of closer fraternal relations. The most cheering sign is afforded by the cordiality with which the fraternal delegates of our church were received by the General Conference of the Church South, and the kindly good-by that was given them when they came away. This feeling expressed during the intercourse of messengers and Conference was, to say the least, different from what had been anticipated, with the difference on the right side. It was shown that the hearts of the two churches are warming toward each other. The address adopted by the Conference, which is a cold and classic document, quite different in tone from the good-by speeches, was designed, we are told by its author, not as an answer to the delegates, but as a review of the whole matter of the relations between the two churches. Perhaps it expresses what the members had determined to say before their hearts were warmed, and what pluck required they should insist upon saying, notwithstanding what had taken place since. It, however, repeats in deliberate terms the desire of the church for the restoration of fraternal relations, and makes provision for effecting that object. Its meaning is more clearly defined by one of the last resolutions adopted by the General Conference, which declares the assembly a unit upon the subject of fraternal relations, "upon a proper basis," as well as upon the propriety of the appointment of commissions for the settlement of all questions of difficulty.

The Methodist refers to the views of the New York Christian Advocate in the following terms:

The Christian Advocate of this city takes a gloomy view of the situation. It thinks that all we can hope for is a cold, diplomatic intercourse. Reticent embassadors will come to us in 1876, "if they come at all" (we quote,) "with a flag of truce, bringing stern and far-reaching demands—the ultimatum of an unfriendly power—which it is, of course, impossible that we shall comply with, and so, of course, the old attitude of unfriendliness must remain." The oracle already scents a coming conflict: "If now there must be a new outbreak of internecine warfare between the two Methodisms, it should be a cause of rejoicing on our part that this state of things is not of our own seeking."

All this would have some weight were it not well known that on this Southern question (and indeed on all leading questions) the Advocate has for years past perpetually bluadered. It began with the confident assertion that the destiny of the Southern Methodist Church was "to be disintegrated and absorbed." By what chemical agencies this was to be effected was not shown. Instead of disintegrating, Southern Methodism has become more compact with each successive year, and would now be too big a mouthful for the most voracious absorber. The truth is that, as we said several years ago, the editor of the Advocate has a genius for getting on the wrong side of public questions. His record is a history of verdicts rendered against his positions by ministry and people. In the present instance we attach very little importance to his vaticinations of evil.

REV. LOVICK PIERCE, D. D.—The Southern Christian Advocate says: We are sorry to be able to report very little if any improvement in Dr. Pierce's condition. He is extremely feeble, and greatly harassed with a severe cough. He is at the Wesleyan Female College, where he receives every attention, and is made as comfortable as the tenderest and most assiduous ministrations can render him. We spent a short time with him yesterday afternoon—June 5—and, though suffering a great deal, he reported himself consciously better than during the previous night, when he was quite ill. We are hopeful that he will yet be heard from the pulpits which for so many years have been graced by his presence and hallowed by his eloquent utterances.

Saturday morning, June 6.—We learn from Dr. Myers that Dr. Pierce passed a more comfortable night than usual, and is feeling better this morning.

THE Richmond Christian Advocate says: Rev. G. M. Bain, Sr., died at his residence, in Portsmouth, on the sixth instant, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. He had been in failing health for months past, and his end was not unexpected. For many years Bro. Bain was a leading man in our church. Earnest, zealous, faithful and devoted as a Christian, his path grew brighter as it neared the gates of the eternal city.

The Missionary.

A NEW PAPER.

The Board of Missions, at a called meeting, June 9, unanimously determined to publish a missionary paper. This is done by authority of the General Conference. It will be edited by the missionary secretaries, and will be called the Missionary. It will be issued monthly, beginning with July.

The Missionary will contain four pages of the same size as the puges of the Sunday School Visitor. The board has determined to send one copy free to each pastor in our church, with the confident expectation that our brethren of the ministry will cordially, promptly and effectively aid us in securing a very large and general circulation. We ought to have—and, with proper effort, may have—ten thousand subscribers by the last day of July.

The Missionary will be devoted to the cause of missions in general, and to the mission work of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in particular. The secretaries will spare no means to make it interesting, instructive and useful. They will put themselves in position to gather missionary intelligence from the entire mission-field in the world, while keeping prominently before the church the wants, workings, opportunities and prospects of our own mission work. All who understand the subject have long felt the need of such a paper. Let every friend of missions help us.

We earnestly request our brethren, the editors of the church papers, and all other editors who delight to help forward a good work like this, to lend us their aid. We ask the Bishops and presiding elders to bring the Missionary before each Annual and District and Quarterly Conference. We request the pastors and superintendents to bring it before each congregation and Sunday school.

Appoint canvassers at once, selecting the best friends of the cause of missions. Begin the day you read this prospectus. Let all help, and now.

Terms—thirty cents per annum to single subscribers; to clubs of four, twenty-five cents; to clubs of ten or more, twenty cents each.

MISSION-ROOM, Nashville, June 10, 1874.

WE ARE INDEBTED to President Pitts for a copy of the programme of commencement exercises of Chappell Hill Female College, Chappell Hill, Texas. It promises to be an occasion of great interest. We are glad to learn that the college has had a prosperous year. Sorry that we cannot be present at the commencement, and get a glimpse of that grand, improving and beautiful country. The exercises begin on Friday, June 19, and end on June 24. Rev. H. S. Thrall delivers the annual sermon. Rev. Frank T. Mitchell delivers the address to the Philomathean Society.

The exercises of the Male Institute of Soule University are assigned to Monday, eight P. M., and Tuesday, half-past ten A. M. Captain John W. McNeely, principal. Literary address on Tuesday, by R. M. Swearingen, M. D.

THE commencement at Whitworth Female College, Brookhaven, Mississippi, promises to be an occasion of great interest. The following is the programme:

June 26, 8 P. M.—Exhibition by Philopean Society.

June 28, 11 A. M.—Commencement sermon by Rev. W. H. Watkins, D.D.

June 29, 9 A. M.—Anniversary of Philopean Society. Address by Rev. B. Galloway. 4 P. M.—Anniversary of Alumni Association. Address by Rev. Joseph Bancroft. 8 P. M.—Grand concert, vocal and instrumental. Eight pianos, besides other instruments, will be in use.

June 30.—Commencement day. Exercises will commence at nine A. M. Annual address by W. L. Nugent, Esq. Conferring degrees by the President.

CENTENARY.—We refer our readers to the eighth page for the programme of commencement exercises of Centenary College. Bishop Marvin preaches the annual sermon on Sunday, July 5. The board of trustees meets on Monday, July 6, at nine A. M. Commencement day, July 8. The friends of the Institution should make it a matter of duty to be there. The exercises promise to be unusually attractive, and all who can attend will be richly rewarded by the preaching and literary addresses. Jackson is noted for its abounding hospitality, and visitors will find cordial welcome and generous entertainment.

THE Minutes of the Louisiana Conference have been brought out in good style by R. J. Harp, 110 and 112 Camp street, New Orleans. Packages of the Minutes have been forwarded to the preachers.

FRATERNAL MESSENGERS.—The Methodist Protestant General Conference, lately held in Lynchburg, Va., the Nashville Christian Advocate says, received kindly the response of the General Conference to its fraternal greeting; and, as we see by the Central Protestant, published at Greensboro, North Carolina, the President appointed the Rev. Drs. Lee and Wilson as fraternal messengers to our next General Conference. We promise these honored brethren a cordial reception, and we trust not that our General Conference will reciprocate the courtesy. We wish to have fraternal intercourse with our Methodist Protestant brethren and all others like-minded.

TO PREACHERS HOLDING DRAFTS ON THE TREASURER OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.—Persons holding drafts for the first, second and third quarters of the current year will please send them to the secretary, and the money will be paid as soon as possible after receiving the drafts. Please to sell them to no other parties, but send them direct to the treasurer or secretary.

J. B. McFERRIN, Sec.

NASHVILLE, June 6, 1874.

THE true Christian is neither afraid of dying or living; he desires to go to heaven to see Christ, yet is willing to stay upon earth to serve Christ.

SEA SHORE HOUSE.—The house known in years past as "Mrs. Walker's," on the beach at the foot of the pier in Ocean Springs, Mississippi, is now open to guests. It is conducted by a son and relative of William C. Chamberlin, deceased, and will be managed, doubtless, in the same manner that the Chamberlin House, which gave such universal satisfaction, was managed. Rooms are large and well ventilated. Mr. T. C. Murphy is in the office. A carriage will meet each train at the depot, and Delly Chamberlin will be usually found on the platform.

DIRECT TRADE.—The thanks of all persons interested in the advantages of direct trade are due to Dr. Thomas D. Worrall, the American director of the Direct Trade Company, whose efforts to arouse attention to the ruinous disadvantages of obtaining imported goods through double shipment, handling and commissions have done so much to awaken investigation of the subject. The doctor may be seen at the office of the Direct Trade Company, 21 and 23 Camp street. Call and see his samples of stock.

OLIVER DITSON & Co., whose advertisements reappear in our columns with this issue, have returned to their building, which was some months since damaged by fire, and are again "at home" to friends and patrons. The firm are among the most extensive music publishers in the world, as is evinced by the fact, as we are informed that their apartments, occupied for the manufacture storage and sale of books and music, have an aggregate length of about half a mile, and are well filled.

E. E. F. ROSS, ESQ., connected for several years with the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, leaves this evening to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities, in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD. The attention of our readers is directed to the advertisement of that splendid line of railroad connecting Cincinnati with Baltimore. To those who do not remember previous notices of it we may say the Baltimore and Ohio is one of the best of roads, and passes through some of the grandest mountain scenery in the world.

TEA WAREHOUSE.—The Great China and Japan Tea Warehouse, No. 170 Canal street, seems determined to offer every facility and inducement to tea-drinkers that can be afforded by low prices and delicious teas. See their advertisement.

ICE CREAM.—See advertisement of Patent Horizontal Revolving Ice Cream Freezers in another column. Messrs. Danner & Toomer, No. 288 Delord street, are the agents.

DO NOT FORGET that Levy Bros., No. 580 Magazine street, are displaying the new goods which arrive weekly. They are fully up with the changes of the seasons.

BRODIE'S CORDIAL, for diseases of the bowels, is advertised by I. L. Lyons, successor to Bull & Lyons, corner of Camp and Gravier streets.

THE LOUISVILLE HOTEL.—Handsome Improvements.—Representatives in the General Conference, and travelers who have recently been guests at the Louisville Hotel, have been abundant in praise of the good management, attention to guests and elegant fare furnished by the proprietors. We clip the following from the Courier-Journal, April 21:

"M. Kenn & Co., proprietors of the Louisville Hotel, during the past twelve months have made extraordinary and successful efforts to make their house beautiful and attractive, as well as a pleasant and comfortable place of entertainment. Last summer the house was remodeled and refitted, so that it became in every respect a new hotel, with all the modern conveniences of the most approved plans. Since the improvements were finished the proprietors have added some new and decorative features to the office, reading-rooms, parlors and halls surrounding the balcony of the rotunda. These ornamentations consist chiefly of a variety of fine paintings from Rome and Florence, with Roman and Florentine frames. Beside these, there is a large collection of beautiful views of palaces and places of interest in Rome, Naples, Milan, Leghorn, Geneva, Heidelberg, and many other European cities, together with the costumes of the different cantons of Switzerland and the armies of all the civilized nations of the world. In fact the whole corridor presents the appearance of a beautiful art gallery.

"In order to perfect the beauty and elegance of the scene the proprietors have, within the last few days, placed against the walls behind the counter in the office four large, handsomely-framed mirrors, upon which are placed four beautiful bronze female statues representing the four 'seasons.' The statues are about five feet in height.

"The mirrors and their adornments give a most striking effect, and on entering the office, as one passes through the rotunda, the reflection of himself and all the surroundings of the office, the balcony overhead with elegant appointments, and the moving forms of handsome ladies and gentlemen on the promenade, all blended together, with a view of the gallery of art in the background, produce a most beautiful and pleasing scene, which at once commands the attention and wins the admiration of all; and through the windows immediately behind the statues are seen fine specimen plants of magnolias, oleanders and myrtles in the court, which add their beauty to all that art has done to make the scene attractive."

THE GREAT JACKSON ROUTE.—The new time-table for the summer has gone into operation, and close connections are now made with all the trunk lines of the North, East and West, making the trip to New York in the astonishingly quick time of sixty-seven hours and twenty-six minutes, making close connections with Boston trains and Sound steamers, reaching Boston at 9.05 P. M. on the same day of arrival at New York. The running time to Chicago, St. Louis and the Virginia Springs is also greatly reduced on this speedy, comfortable and safe route. Pullman palace cars on all trains, and baggage checked through to all points.

IRON COTTON TIES.—Messrs. Bartlett & Rayne, No. 48 Carondelet street, corner of Union, present to their customers a list of the most improved and economical cotton ties. They are fair and honorable men to deal with, and prompt and attentive to business. See their advertisement.

COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.—Mr. J. W. Blackman, No. 131 Carondelet street, is a conscientious and competent instructor a gentleman of unblemished character and good address, all of which will leave its impress upon the boys committed to his training.

WHENEVER you want to enjoy soup put into a plate of it a tablespoonful of Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce. You will not again taste soup unless you have the Sauce. If you can possibly get it. GOOD TEA AT LAST!

Tea-drinkers who long for and truly delight in a good, pure, honest CUP OF TEA should visit or send to the Great China and Japan Tea Warehouse,

NO. 170 CANAL STREET.

Our establishment is presided over by a professional Tea Taster, whose extensive experience, both in this country and in Europe, enables us to please the most critical taste. Old Country Folks who have vainly been sighing and longing these many years for something like the good Old-fashioned Tea, are particularly charmed and delighted with the flavor, fragrance and freshness of our goods.

We are selling Black and Mixed Teas at from 50 cents to $1 per pound. Green Teas of all kinds at from 50 cents to $1.40, all of which will be found of good value at their respective prices.

For a good economical Tea we recommend our Black or Mixed, at 60 cents per pound, which will be found in many instances superior to goods sold in this city at $1 and $1.25 per pound.

For a best Tea our Black or Mixed, at $1 per pound, cannot possibly be excelled anywhere.

Persons who cannot conveniently visit our establishment should send their orders by mail. We deliver goods to all parts of the city free of charge. Country orders by express C. O. THE GREATEST

MEDICAL

DISCOVERY

OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,

FROM

The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a burning sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Raw and Inflamed,

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and piling away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly,

DONALD KENNEDY.

PRAYER.

BY S. L. G.

Oh! Lord, when we pray,
Teach us what to say;
Teach us how we may Ask and receive, oh! God.

Lord, thy Spirit send;
Oh! be thou our friend;
In our nature blend
And be our life, oh! God.

May we feel thee near,
Our Savior, ever dear;
Hope, trust, faith; no fear,
But confidence, oh! God.

Oh! Lord, send the day
When thy servants may
With gratitude say:
"Be done thy will, oh! God."

IN THE SWING.

Baby and I
Are going to swing;
Boys, come and push us!
That's just the thing!
Now we go up!
Now we come down!
Up in the apple-tree—
Down to the ground.
Dear little head
Lies on my breast,
Trusting and safe
As a bird in its nest.
No matter how swiftly,
How low or how high,
We're pleasantly swinging—
Baby and I!

FOR THE ADVOCATE,

Bennie.

"Oh! mother, the boys are going to Magnolia swamp to hunt to-morrow. Please let me go."

What could the mother say? She looked into the bright eyes of her noble boy, and scarcely knew how to answer him. Why was it that there always came a dread into her loving heart whenever that beautiful place was mentioned? And yet it was the dream of her son's boyhood to go there. Was there some vague feeling of coming evil associated with it, that she would fain cast from her as long as possible?

This time Bennie looked at her so pleadingly. She felt as though it was hard that he should be a martyr to her foolish fears, and to his second request she gave a reluctant answer in the affirmative.

He was to go to school on that day (Friday,) go home with some cousins in the evening, and the next day was to dawn, as he thought, the brightest day in all his life. The kind mother provided him with everything necessary for his comfort and kissed him good-by.

Bennie was one of those children that we only meet now and then. He was about twelve years of age, and we would search a long time among the boyish faces around us to find one bearing a nobler, more manly stamp. Obedience was to him as natural as it was to move. His teachers never had to cross-question him to find if he had done something not exactly proper. If there was a noise in the school-room, and he was concerned in it, the truth, the whole truth, was acknowledged in as frank a manner as if he were reciting a well-prepared lesson. Whether his acts were always commended (for there was a vein of mischief in his nature that he sometimes could scarcely control,) teachers and pupils were obliged to admire his noble candor. In his classes no one stood better. If a lesson was difficult for him, diligent study soon mastered it. I have looked into his noble face sometimes and wondered what he would be in future years. His broad brow, his bright brown eyes, his resolute mouth, seemed to say: He will make a man of whom this community will speak with pride.

No wonder that every one loved Bennie and was glad to be with him. When school hours were over that evening it was a merry crowd that started out, and none were happier than Bennie, for whatever he did he did with his might.

Saturday morning dawned bright and beautiful, and the lively group of boys started for their hunt. Gay little birds were hopping among the trees, and now and then the agile form of a frolicsome squirrel would be seen in the top of a lofty beech. Farther and farther they wound among the vines and magnolias. Fragrant jessamines festooned the pathway, and in many places the ground was covered with wild flowers. Boys do not always notice these things, but on this sweet spring morning methinks the dew-drops sparkled too merrily not to be seen by them.

They had killed a few squirrels when one boy, looking up, saw a splendid black one. Who should win that prize? they all thought. They circled themselves around the tree, and each was to shoot as an opportunity presented itself. One or two had made fruitless efforts to bring to the ground the beautiful little creature, when it came Bennie's turn. His gun was emptied of its contents with no effect, when in eager haste he shouted: "Shoot him, cousin!" and in his excitement rushed between the aimed gun of his cousin and the tree.

Oh! God, have mercy on them all, for the pretty squirrel went its way and the fatal shot entered the breast of the noble boy, who fell mangled and bleeding upon the cold ground.

They ran to him, raised his head, and heard his "oh;" but no word came from the pallid lips. What was the word he would have breathed in those last moments? We cannot know, but perchance it was a call for the sweet mother miles away, who he loved so tenderly.

Even boys do not lose all their presence of mind, and help was the one thing of which they thought. They were soon on their horses seeking that.

We would not look upon the heart-rending scene which followed. He was carried to a house not far off, and kind friends washed away the life-blood, which had long ceased to flow, ere the parents could be summoned. Who can know their agony? There lay their bright, beautiful and only boy, who had left them in the glow of health just the day before. Cold were his hands, and pallid were his lips. He could not feel his mother's warm kiss upon them, or the hot tears that fell upon his brow.

Some things in this life seem so strange, and yet we feel sure that "he doeth all things well." We sometimes think how many could have been better spared, and yet who was so ready to go? How many little boys and girls are there whose obedience is always willing, whose lips always speak the truth?

Are such precious children taken that they may teach those who were their playmates and friends how necessary it is always to be ready to meet death? Perchance it is so. Yes, children, you may be in the bloom of health to-day, but you know not that to-morrow's sun will rise upon your young life. Strive each day to perform some sweet act of kindness for those around you. If you should be called away to-day, what a comfort it would be to your mother if, like Bennie's, she could sit and think of you and say: "Ah! I know my boy rests in the Savior's bosom; he was so pure, so truthful, obedient and kind."

Yes, Bennie is resting. Many a time his little sisters have covered his grave with pale, sweet flowers. A little deeper have grown the lines upon his father's brow, and a sadder, sweeter smile plays around the mouth of the patient mother, but they can look upon the vanished life of their boy with pure pleasure, and cherish the Christian's hope of meeting him "beyond the river." S. W. H.

The Refiner.

There was once a little piece of gold lying hid in the earth. It had lain hid so long that it thought it should never be used, and it said to itself: "Why do I lie idle here? Why am I not picked up, that men may see me shine?"

One day a man dug it up and looked at it, and said: "There is some gold in this lump; but I cannot use it as it is; I must take it to the refiner." When the refiner got it he threw it into a melting-pot, and heated his fire to melt the gold. As soon as the little piece of gold felt the heat of the fire it began to tremble, and cried: "I wish I had lain quiet in the earth." But the fire grew hotter and hotter, till at last the gold melted and left all the earthy part of the lump by itself.

"Now," said the gold, "my troubles are over; now I shall shine." But its troubles were not over yet. The man took it once more, and began to hammer it into some shape. "Ah!" said the gold, "what a trouble it is to be gold; if I had been dross or common earth I should not have been put to all this pain." "That is true," replied the man; "if you had been dross you would not have had all this pain; but then you would not have become what you are now—a beautiful gold ring."

The piece of gold is a little child. The dross or common earth means the child's faults and weaknesses. Jesus is the Refiner; he sends trials and troubles to us to make us good and strong, and to take away our weaknesses and faults.

Pain is one of a little child's trials. If we bear it patiently, Jesus will make us better by pain. He will make you brave and gentle. Next time when you have to bear pain say to yourself: "Jesus is taking away my faults; I must be patient." Parables for Children.

TRIFLES! TRIFLES! TRIFLES!—"Don't," said the pony to the flies, and he shook his head and lashed his tail about, and away they all flew.

"Don't, I say," he cried again, moving to another place, where he hoped he should lose them. And so he did for a minute or two, but no longer. There they were—in his eyes, on his nose, at his ears, and all over him.

If he could have eaten them all he would, or kicked them into the next county he would, or galloped them out of the world he would; but there was no doing anything with them. As he moved they moved; and every time he attempted to graze they settled themselves on him, or buzzed in a cloud round his head, as regularly as if they had come by invitation.

"Oh, dear!" he sighed at last, "what is to be done? I can bear my master's whip and spur; I can stand being half worked to death over the country, and with the heavy cart—those are evils I make up my mind to; and if that yelping cur comes behind me I can give him a reception that sends him flying; but as to these torments, contemptible as they are—too small to be met effectually—I verily believe they'll be the death of me!"

Ah! so is it in human life as in pony life. Great trials can often be bravely borne, when petty annoyances, by their number and pertinacity, vex and wear the soul.

A YOUNG HERO.—The following is but one of many scenes of sorrow and self-sacrifice which have been witnessed in our city. It has just come to our notice. It occurred yesterday. It was a family of six—a father and mother, two sisters and two brothers. The fever entered their house, and all were stricken down but one little boy of twelve years. He alone was left to minister to them. The mother was called away, and the little boy was well-nigh broken-hearted. The physician had just called when the mother died, and, turning to the weeping child, said to him: "You must dry up your tears and go wait upon your sisters, and don't let them know, by your crying, that your ma is dead, for it may hurt them." Brave little fellow! He went instantly, washed his face and dried up his tears, and entered the room where his sisters lay. The first question that was asked him was: "How is ma?" No tears betrayed the heavy heart, but, choking down his sorrow, with cheerful tone he answered, "Ma is better off now," and the sisters did not find out their loss. Noble boy! May God spare your father and sisters! Surely there is other heroism than that which is on battle-fields.—Memphis Presbyterian.

Sweet Potatoes.

MR. EDITOR: In the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE of the eleventh somebody gives his views and experiments with raising and keeping sweet potatoes. Very well.

I will call the attention of planters generally to the experience of two old and eminently successful tillers of the soil and raisers of the esculent in question.

By accident, as most good things have been forced upon our attention, the first one, over twenty years ago, discovered that if he cut his potato-vines close to the ground before frost, and left the potatoes in the ground for five or six weeks, or even longer, that he gained two unexpected results. First, his potatoes were not so much inclined to rot. It seems as if a vine, once touched with frost, sends back to the potato the poison of easy and early ruin. Think of this.

The next result he obtained was quite marvelous.

By leaving his potatoes in the ground six weeks they doubled in size and measure, growing as much after the vines were cut as they had done up to the time of cutting.

I related this, as a great curiosity, to a gentleman who had for many years supplied Memphis with garden products, and he verified the statement of the Louisiana sugar planter.

I learned from two others that by saving the green vines all winter, and planting them instead of seed potatoes, they get a better vegetable, and save the seed for use for the cow and the table.

There are other curious things about this vegetable. But this article is long enough. K.

NEW ORLEANS, June 12, 1874.

English Mode of Feeding Sheep.

Mr. George E. Waring has lately made a trip to England and Germany, and he describes, in his "Ogden Farm Papers," their method of feeding their national crop—turnips—to sheep in the field. He says:

"One universal custom in England, which must be of great value, is denied to us of the North by reason of our severe winter climate, but I commend its consideration to those of my readers who live south of Pennsylvania, where snow and frost are infrequent and are of short duration. I refer to the feeding of turnips and other roots on the land, the entire cost of harvesting being saved, and the manure being efficiently distributed without labor. When the crop is grown a small part of the field is fenced off with hurdles, which are very simple frames (made generally of rough poles) about eight feet long and three feet high, the posts being pointed to be driven into the ground with ease. The area to be fed off is inclosed, and a certain number of sheep are confined within the hurdles. They get their chief living from the turnips, and are kept on that piece until they have eaten down into the ground, consuming roots and all. In addition to the turnips, they are usually fed twice a day with Indian meal, oat meal or some other grain, and they occasionally receive a little hay. When the piece occupied has been eaten over, three sides of the inclosure are removed, so as to take in the next section, and that is treated in the same way. A greater or less proportion of the food consists of grain, according to the degree to which it is desired to manure the land. Mangel-wurzel is frequently fed in the same manner, though only during the early part of the season, before there is danger of frost. Mangel-wurzel itself is often used in the place of grain for feeding sheep in hurdles, to manure the land, and even land on which these roots are being taken out of the banks where they are stored and fed in the inclosure. When the piece occupied has been sufficiently manured, the sheep are moved, as though there were turnips to feed, and the land is thus manured section by section.

"This part of the treatment is quite open to all of us to adopt, and there is no reason why we may not make a very important use of the service of sheep in the distribution of manure in this way, though in our severe climate it would be necessary to furnish some sort of shelter. I have seen a plan of a movable sheep shelter, a sort of shed built on runners, which, when empty, may be drawn by a horse from place to place. In addition to this, there should be two or three troughs in which to put the feed, and these should be daily moved from one part of the inclosure to another. At the same time locks of hay should be thrown about in different places, to cause the sheep to spread, and prevent their dropping their manure mainly by the shelter and near the troughs. The floor of the shelter should be solid; so that the manure, which would naturally accumulate there in greater quantity, may be thrown about with shovels."

Poultry.

The following, from the American Poultry Gazette, is worthy of study by those who have just engaged in the business of rearing fowls:

RULES FOR REARING CHICKENS.—1. Keep young chickens in a warm, dry coop. 2. The coop should be cleaned out and dry earth thrown in every day. 3. Let the chickens out after the morning sun has removed the wet from the grass. 4. Feed them suitable food and frequently. 5. Keep pure water where they can get it easily. 6. Keep them away from decaying fruit and vegetables and stagnant pools.

FOOD FOR CHICKENS.—Thomas Heathwood, a successful breeder of game fowls, gives the following as the proper food for young chickens: One egg, with the shell, beaten into a quart of raw oat meal, and wet up with new milk. Feed them from four to six times a day, according to age. Lettuce, onion-tops or fresh grass, chopped fine, should be given them at least once a day.

EGGS.—A good egg is made up of ten parts shell, sixty parts white and thirty parts yolk. The white of an egg contains eighty-six per cent. of water, the yolk fifty-two per cent. The average weight of an egg is two ounces.

COLD IN THE THROAT.—This disease is manifest by a noise as if some substance had stuck in the throat. Phlegm is present in the throat. The following remedy is highly recommended: A tablespoonful of water containing two drops of the tincture of aconite, given two or three times a day, and plenty of fresh water to drink.

BUYING EGGS.—There are many reasons why people desire to buy eggs instead of fowls; the principal one is the great difference in the cost of first-class birds and their eggs. The money necessary to purchase such fowls cannot be spared, and a start may be gained by purchasing eggs with much less money. Mr. Williams, a gentleman of great experience, says: "People expect greater results than they should in purchasing eggs for hatching. The breeder, however much experience he may have, may not make up his breeding-pens as they should be, and hence every bird may not be perfect."

HENS' NESTS.—Hens' nests should be made by placing in the bottom of the nest-basket or box a cut turf and a shovel of dry earth or ashes; on this place short straw, first hollowing out the earth in the shape of a nest. A more even temperature is obtained for the eggs than in straw nests alone. Such nests are particularly adapted for early setting, when the weather is cold.

SEX OF EGGS.—It is frequently asserted that the sex of eggs can be determined by the shape of the egg, the position of the air-cell, the curl or twist at the small end, etc. These tests have been disproved by careful experiments, and upon the best of authority we assert that all such ideas and theories are erroneous and absurd.

CHICKEN SALAD.—Well-fattened chickens of medium size, tender and delicate, make better salad than over-grown ones. Put them on to cook in the morning, and save the water they are boiled in for soup. When cold remove the skin and cut the flesh in pieces in size you prefer. Some like the meat very coarse; others choose it quite fine. This is entirely a matter of taste. When cut up throw over the dish a towel slightly damped in cold water, to keep the meat from drying. Take the best celery you can find, and cut it of the size you wish. The "fancy cooks" cut both celery and chicken into bits about half an inch long and half an inch thick; but we think the salad better cut finer. When the celery is cut, put it between clean cloths to dry perfectly, and then prepare the dressing. For dressing for two chickens take three-fourths of a bottle of the purest salad oil, two scant tablespoonfuls of the best mustard, the yolks of two raw eggs and of twelve hard-boiled ones. Put the eggs to be boiled in a saucepan of cold water over a quick fire; bring them to a boil and let them boil hard ten minutes, then drop them in cold water. When cool remove the shells. Break the raw eggs and drop the yolks into a dish large enough to make all the dressing in; beat them, stirring slowly the same for ten minutes; then slowly add the mustard, mix it with the eggs thoroughly, then add a teaspoonful of the best vinegar, and when this is well mixed add the oil, a drop at a time, stirring constantly and always the same way; then rub the yolks of the hard-boiled eggs very smooth, and stir in lightly a teacup of vinegar, and pour it slowly into the first mixture and stir it together as lightly as possible with a silver fork. Now season the chicken and celery with salt and pepper, and as soon as ready for use pour on the dressing.

FROSTING CAKE.—To frost two loaves take one sheet of Cowper's isinglass, pour one-half teacupful of boiling water over it, and let it stand on the back side of your stove to dissolve slowly. When it is dissolved, so that there is no scum on top, take it off the stove and add to it one pound of powdered sugar and a teaspoonful of starch, which makes it look shiny. Have your cakes cold. I often bake them the day before frosting. Pour the frosting over the cake; do not use a knife more than necessary, as it injures the looks of the cake; set away in a smooth place to harden. It is very necessary to use pure water to dissolve the isinglass in. In the winter season I melt snow and use that. Be sure and melt it in a bright tin dish. I think this recipe far preferable to the old-fashioned whites of eggs and sugar recipe. M. C. W., in Household.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.

Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of nasal passages, discharge falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, acrid, thick and tenacious, mucous, purulent, muco purulent, bloody, putrid, offensive, etc. In others a dryness, dry, watery, weak or inflamed eyes, ringing in ears, deafness, hawking and coughing to clear the throat, ulcerations, scabs from ulcers, voice altered, nasal twang, offensive breath, impaired smell and taste, dizziness, mental depression, tickling cough, etc. Only a few of the above symptoms are likely to be present in any case at one time. No disease is more common or less understood by physicians. The proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy will pay $500 reward for an incurable case.

READ WHAT IT WILL DO.

BROOKVILLE, PA., April 27, 1872.

DR. R. V. PIERCE—Sir: Having first applied to a number of home physicians and failed to get relief, I resolved to try your Remedy. Four bottles have completely cured me of one of the worst cases of Catarrh of which I have any knowledge, having suffered for months with an acute pain in the head, and breathed only with the greatest difficulty. I deem it due you, as well as suffering humanity, that this recognition be made of what we deem an invaluable medicine.

THE SUFFERERS WITH RHEUMATISM.

To relieve the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," a medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief and in most cases cures permanently. During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this painful disease, with this medicine; and, what assures me most, the patient recovered by the use of the first bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but rheumatism, and should the patient not receive by using the first bottle of it, that patient is cheated with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

PANCHROMATIC PICTURES.

These Pictures, for beauty, durability and cheapness, are the lead of all other photographic inventions. Chemists and Photographers have vainly tried to introduce them in perfected form, and it is only recently that they were presented in New Orleans by Mr. H. BUSCH, of California, in such perfection of finish as to defy the criticism of connoisseurs in the Fine Arts.

Having secured the services of the above-named gentleman, I beg to announce to the public that I am now prepared to produce by this new discovery the most perfect presentments which, for fidelity to nature, will rival the touch of the great masters of art.

Prices are, for life size, $10; for life-size bust, $6; cabinet, $4; enlarging from card or small-sized photos to life, with 8x10 frame complete, $3. Enamelling and work in the latest styles also executed. Those wishing Pictures can send negatives.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CONVERSATION FAN.

THE LAST AND MOST ABSORBING SENSATION OF THE DAY IS, TO USE A THEatrical phrase, "a great take." Everybody, to be en regle for the season, and to evoid the proscription of imperious fashion, must have A CONVERSATION FAN.

No family circle is complete in social diversions and entertainments without one, and in order to enjoy the pastime it should be distinctly understood that the answers do not numerically follow the questions, but to spice the amusement an answer must be looked for that will afford a fitting response to an interrogatory.

Where a direct answer is not to be found to a direct question, it will be discovered that it furnishes the sequel to a sustained conversation, so that couples can carry on a tete-a-tete, which they may not wish to make audible, by silent indications of numbers.

THE CONVERSATION FAN

is an infallible remedy against dullness, breaking the spell of silence by a suggestive inquiry, furnishing congenial pleasures for an evening's entertainment, and opening up a novel and ingenious method of whiling away agreeable hours at home, in the promenade, at a party or private gathering.

ONLY TEN CENTS A FAN.

To be had at Harp's, Gresham's, Ellis & Bro.'s, Haley's, Kein & Co.'s, and all the Book Stores in the city, and at Piffet's, and issued by JOSEPH JONES, M. D., Professor of Chemistry.

SAMUEL LOGAN, M. D., Professor of Anatomy.
ERNEST S. LEWIS, M. D., Professor of Materia Medica.
EDMOND SOUCHON, M. D., Demonstrator of Anatomy.

The Forty-First Annual Course of Instruction

in this Department will commence on Monday, the Sixteenth of NOVEMBER, 1874, and terminate on the third Saturday of March, 1875. Preliminary Lectures on Clinical Medicine and Surgery will be delivered in the amphitheater of the great Charity Hospital, beginning on the Twentieth of October, without any charge to the students. The anatomical rooms will be opened at the same time. The members of the Faculty are visiting physicians and surgeons to the Charity Hospital, and give instruction daily at the bedside of the sick.

FEES.—As the practical advantages afforded in New Orleans for a thorough acquaintance with all the branches of medicine are quite as great as if not superior to those offered by the schools of New York and Philadelphia, the same fees are demanded. For all the Lectures, $140; Matriculation, $5; Practical Anatomy, $10; Graduation, $30. Payment required in advance.

MACHINERY, TIES, ETC.

IMPROVED

EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the 1welfth instant:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	1,485
Arkansas		151
Total		1,650

On Saturday the market opened with a limited inquiry, but as factors evinced a disposition to meet the demand more freely, buyers subsequently came forward and took 1,150 bales, divided among nine brokers, at rather easier prices, hardly establishing a quotable decline. The advantage, nevertheless, was on the side of the purchaser. In several cases offers were accepted which would have been refused on Friday, and it was more difficult to realize outside rates. Good ordinary, benders', sold at 15c., strict low middling at 16¾@16¾c., the latter for high style, and strict middling to good middling at 18c. On Monday the sales amounted to 800 bales. Nothing transpired to indicate any quotable change in prices, which, however, exhibited some irregularity. On Tuesday there was a moderate inquiry, which was subsequently stimulated by factors evincing a disposition to meet the demand more freely, and the business summed up 2,050 bales, at irregular and easier prices, showing a pretty general decline of ⅛c.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 4,600 bales, against 2,509 for the corresponding time last week and 4,650 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,200,721 bales, against 1,194,380 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 273,101 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 4,786 to Great Britain, of 116,934 to France, and of 122,502 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

DOMESTIC.

MILWAUKIE, June 18.—The Episcopal Convention last night elected Dr. Edward R. Weils, of Minnesota, Bishop of this diocese.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 18.—The steamers Van Couver and Lord of the Isles, from China, arrived this evening. The Lord of the Isles brings one hundred and forty-five Chinese passengers, and the Van Couver six hundred and thirteen.

The latest Chinese papers state that the vessel lost in the China seas, with all on board, was the steamer Scotland, not the bark Scotland, from this port, as was supposed.

GALVESTON, June 18.—The Indians have all gone south and west from the reservation. It is the general impression that they will raid the frontiers of Texas. Santana now holds an unimportant position in the counells. Bigbow is the chief of the Kiowas, and is regarded as bloodthirsty and determined to give the frontier people trouble.

NEW YORK, June 20.—Constantinople advices state that the Turkish vessel Kars, en route for Saloulca, was run into in the Sea of Marmora by the Egyptian vessel Behera, and sunk in a few minutes. The Kars had three hundred and forty persons on board, including passengers and crew. Of this number three hundred and twenty were drowned.

WASHINGTON, June 22.—The following seems to be the most reliable statement of the situation: The Fort St. Philip canal bill, having passed the House, is on the Senate calendar, to be acted upon by the Senate next session. The President, it is believed, will appoint engineers, under the new bill just passed, who will report in favor of the canal project, which will probably insure its passage. The same is true as to the levee bill. The appropriation of $500,000 for the relief of the overflowed has passed both houses; also the two bills creating a commission to report on both the Fort St. Philip canal and the levees. The whole subject is now before Congress in such a manner as to make it pretty certain that Congress will take charge of the levees and construct the canal.

The Carpenter new election bill is of course killed.

The impeachment matter of Busteed and Durell was not acted upon, nor likely to be.

WASHINGTON, June 23.—The postage on newspapers is fixed at two cents per pound.

Congress will adjourn at four o'clock to-day.

The conference committee of the two houses agreed this morning to amend the substitute recommended by the Senate transportation committee for the Fort St. Philip canal bill, as follows: The commission of engineers who are to survey the mouth of the river is to consist of three army engineers, three from civil life and one from the coast survey.

One of the last bills to pass the Senate was General Young's bill to improve the Oostanaula river, in Georgia. The appropriation is $10,000.

The appropriation for the flooded of the Southwest was reduced to $400,000.

The speaker appointed E. R. Hoar, of Massachusetts, and Mitchell, of Wisconsin, members of the commission to frame a permanent government for the District of Columbia.

For some time before the hour of final adjournment there was a noisy murmur of leave-taking among the members. As the hands on the dial of the clock pointed to six, the speaker, wishing all members a safe and happy return to their homes, pronounced the first session of the forty-third Congress adjourned. No impeachment. The new tariff bill failed.

The bill for the survey of waterworks passed.

Congress has provided for a commission to report upon the levees, and another commission to survey the mouth of the Mississippi river and report upon the best method of securing an efficient outlet from the river. It is expected that the next Congress will assume the whole charge of the levee system of the Mississippi river.

FOREIGN.

CALCUTTA, June 17.—Prospects for future crops are greatly improved by copious rains now falling throughout the country. Three hundred thousand persons are being fed by the government.

Meteorological observers give notice of the appearance of a cyclone, and the inhabitants are preparing for it. Shipping in the river has been warned, and all precautions taken.

ROME, June 19.—The text of the address delivered by the Pope to the Cardinals on Tuesday last is published. The Pope renews his protests against the usurpation of the Papal States, the abolition of religious corporations, and other acts of the Italian government, so that the enemies of the church may not be able to plead justification as an undisputed custom.

He is also moved to allude to these subjects again, because he recently received overtures of reconciliation, and had in his possession a respectful letter, urging that, as vicar of God and of peace, he should pardon his enemies, and withdraw excommunications pronounced against them.

But he declares he cannot make peace with the enemies of the church, and in conclusion exhorts cardinals to imitate the conduct of foreign bishops, especially those of Germany and Brazil.

American pilgrims who went to Venice have left that city for Bavaria.

LISBON, June 19.—Advices from Rio Janeiro state that the yellow fever has broken out in Bahia, and is raging with great violence.

LONDON, June 20.—The Pall Mall Gazette says that the success of the Congress of International Law, called to meet at Brussels, is very doubtful. The governments of England, France and Austria, says the Gazette, raise objections to the scheme, and Switzerland extends to it but feeble support.

HAVANA, June 21.—An immense water-spout formed in the harbor today and passed through the shipping, causing considerable damage. The Russian bark Jonny was capsized, and several small boats sunk. No lives lost. Men-of-war fired blank cartridges, which had the effect of dissolving the column of water.

LONDON, June 21.—The steamer Edinburg, which is laying telegraph cable from Cape DeVerde to Brazil, has arrived off the Brazilian coast. The following dispatch was received to-day from on board:

"Noon, Sunday.—Spliced on the intermediate cable in eleven hundred fathoms this morning. Hope to make a final splice at three this afternoon. Cable is in perfect condition."

PERNAMBUCO, June 23.—The successful laying of the submarine cable, bringing Brazil into traffic communication with Europe, has been the occasion of much pleasurable excitement in this country, and there is a general jubilee in Pernambuco.

From the Work.

PEARLINGTON CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: At the last session of the Mississippi Annual Conference, when Bishop Wightman was announcing the appointments of the preachers, my ear caught the sound of Pearlington, and in quick connection therewith my own name.

My reception was all that heart could desire, each one seeming to vie with the other as to who should be the kindest in giving the earliest attention. I found true, heartfelt religion here to commence with, and the consequent fruits following. A warmer-hearted, nobler-souled people never lived than these, being devoted to the church and endowed with the true spirit of benevolence. It is truly pleasant to be among and serve them.

There being no parsonage on the circuit, the people have secured a comfortable house for the present year's use, and some of our liberal and enterprising official members speak of taking steps to have a parsonage built this year. When my family arrived here in March the house in which we were to live was in readiness for us to enter. Some of the excellent lady members took the matter of furnishing it out of mine into their own hands. House, stove and dining-room were thus provided with the necessary articles for housekeeping; and still they are ministering to our comfort, studying our wants and supplying them before we realize them ourselves.

We have at Pearlington a live Sunday school, with seventy-eight scholars in regular attendance; also regular weekly prayer meetings. I preach here two Sabbaths in each month, the other two being devoted to other points. Penitents flock to the altar when invited, and our numbers are gradually increasing.

Now, Mr. Editor, is it not encouraging to be in the midst of such pleasant surroundings, serving such a dear people, and to be the recipient of such kind attention "for the work's sake?" PASTOR.

FORT ST. PHILIP CANAL SURVEY AND THE LEVEES.—Relief Appropriation.—The following private telegram has been courteously furnished us for publication by Messrs. J. H. Oglesby and John Phelps:

"Washington, June 23.—In pursuance of the provisions of the bills creating commissions to report upon the Fort St. Philip canal and the Mississippi levees, those commissions will be composed of three army officers, three civil engineers and one from the coast survey, to examine the Mississippi river outlet and the proposed Fort St. Philip canal; for the levees the commission will be composed of three army officers and two civil engineers.

"Four hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated for relief of the Mississippi valley sufferers, but nothing for levee construction.

JOHN M. SANDIDGE."

AN ABANDONED BARK AT SEA.—The bark Chief, Captain Harding, reached New York on the thirtieth of May from Messina, after a voyage of sixty days. The captain reports that on the third of May, in latitude 43° 20′, longitude 20° 10′, he sighted a water-logged ship with her mainmast, foretopmast and jibboom gone. She was laden with pine timber, which was adrift and was washing about the deck. Her mainmast had evidently been cut away to lighten her, and its fall had carried away the jibboom. Her main rails and the partitions of her cabin had been broken by the floating timbers, some of which were forty feet long. On her after-house the captain found two quarter boards with the name Crimea painted. He also found some Pensacola newspapers, dated March 8 and 12, and judged from these that the vessel was from that port. Her crew had evidently saved themselves, for the boats were gone, and no provisions or clothing were on board. The Crimea was from Nova Scotia.

The Massacre in China.

THE RECENT DREADFUL SLAUGHTER OF CHINESE CHRISTIANS—TEN THOUSAND VICTIMS SACRIFICED.

The French periodical, Missions Catholiques, gives us the first authentic and detailed narrative of the recent massacre of Roman Catholic native converts in China. The account, as translated for the London Tablet, relates that the massacre broke out on the twenty-fifth of February, when the "literates," as the persecuting party is called, opened the campaign by beheading two men in the service of Pere Doare, and a Christian, whom they then threw into the river. The same day they burned the three villages of Trun-Lam, Nio-Vinh and Bau-Tach, and massacred the inhabitants that were in them. Those who succeeded in escaping to the woods were hunted down with hounds, brought back and killed on the following day. The river was covered over with bodies floating down it from the side of Lareg. At that time the murderers were massacring the Christians of the parish of Holven, and were burning their villages. Those who took refuge in the cliffs of the neighborhood were hunted down and burned alive.

The grand mandarin of justice was at the market of Sa-Nam with eight hundred soldiers, but remained an inactive spectator of the massacre of the Christians of Nam-Duong, only a few of whom were able to escape. * * * The literates, who were the heads of the militia appointed to massacre the Christians, say that the work of extermination carried out under the eyes of the mandarins was concerted between the court and the literates, and was done in reprisal for recent events. The mandarins have just received orders from the court not to employ any other means save those of persuasion to stop the murderers in their career. One of the chiefs, who had just caused two Christians to be murdered on the highroad, went on the parade before the governor of the citadel, by whom he was dismissed with honor. On his return twenty women and children fell under the sword of this man and his followers. He had just come from offering sacrifice to the goddess of prostitution, to whom a famous temple that stands near the road is dedicated.

In several localities they take an entire family—father, mother and children—bind them together with bamboos, and then fling the bundle of living humanity into the waves. First, however, they take care to cut off the man's head. The multitude of dead bodies thus fastened together, in groups of from eight to ten, block up the principal river, but to the great surprise of everybody does not send forth any bad smell. There are, then, five parishes, containing nearly ten thousand Christians, which have to be blotted out of the mission, namely: Lang-Thank-Huyen, Nam-Duong, Hoy-Yen and Doreg-Thank. Many of the victims died in the midst of flames. A village of more than four hundred Christians was attacked by the literates, and soon became a prey to the flames. Among these four hundred Christians there were one hundred and twenty, more or less, who succeeded in saving themselves by taking refuge in a large village near by. The remainder—about three hundred—were nearly all massacred.

Two small villages of Christians, situated two hours' walk from the place at which I then was, were hemmed in by the pagans. The mayor visited each house, numbered the Christians, and forbade them, under threat of the most severe punishment, to go out of doors. A few of the Christian women attempted to go to the market to keep themselves from starving. They never returned. Some pagan women that went with them say that the Christian women were captured and beheaded. Two men from one of these same villages hazarded a flight during the night. They crossed the great river by swimming, and came to me to tell their misfortunes. "Alas!" writes Archbishop Gautier, from whose letter this information is chiefly derived: "I could do nothing but weep for them; being unable to do anything to succor them. Two or three days afterward I learned that all the men in that village had had their heads cut off; but the women and children were spared. And, as their houses were intermingled with those of the pagans, it was forbidden to burn them down."

KILLING CATERPILLARS.—Isaac N. Jaquess, a pioneer of Mount Carmel, Illinois, has found a way to kill caterpillars, and that way he tells through the Register, as follows: "I have an orchard which has been badly infested with caterpillars, and I tried many ways to get rid of them. First, by burning them out, which perhaps would have answered had I commenced soon enough. I then tried shaking them out of the trees, but they were soon back again. My last plan was as follows: Scrape all the loose bark from the trunk of the tree, then take a strip of woolen cloth, and, after saturating it with sulphur and grease, tie it around the body of the tree just below where the branches start out; then take a brush and paint a strip two or three inches wide at the band on the tree. The caterpillars, after being shaken out, will again endeavor to mount the tree, but will stop at the sulphur line, where they will be destroyed by the bushel. A week's labor could have been saved had I known of this plan at the start. I believe it worthy of publication."

An Unparalleled Calamity.

BREAKING OF THE BANKS OF A VAST RESERVOIR ON MILL RIVER, NORTHAMPTON, MASS.—DESTRUCTION OF THREE FACTORY VILLAGES, WITH GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.

MR. EDITOR: We had only ascended the Mississippi river beyond the flood which had so desolated our rich and fertile country below, when a paper was brought on board our boat, revealing a tale of woe surpassing in its tragic power much of our own by the flood of the Connecticut valley in the North. The voice of the Lord was not only heard upon the waters below, but thundered in a cataract at the North, plunging into ruin three factory villages, with many of its inhabitants, in the twinkling of an eye. One hundred and fifty bodies of the dead have been already dug out of the debris, and they were still digging for more, we understood. The great and heavy buildings of beauty and strength melted away like a snow-wreath, and were engulfed in the rushing waves, and borne off upon the stream. Trees were torn up from their roots, and some persons clinging to their branches for life. The scene is beyond the power of language to express or pen to describe. The like has never occurred in the history of our country.

These factory villages were composed of operatives, most of whom were natives of the country; and many of them members of the different churches of a true religious character. Since our arrival here from New Orleans nothing else has been talked of. All hearts are touched with sympathy, and every benevolent feeling called in requisition to assist the sufferers. Incidents of the most interesting kind fill our papers. Two foreign girls of industry and prudence had saved money enough to send for their parents and family across the ocean. They had just arrived, and the happy group were at the breakfast-table, enjoying to perfection the society so long wished for by the two sisters; but, alas! the rushing wave burst in upon the lovely circle, and bore them all away, to be seen no more. The two sisters escaped, by some means, only to mourn, and one of them is in the insane asylum, overwhelmed by the calamity.

A physician of well-known piety and worth, whose health had declined, was about starting for Philadelphia for advice, with his wife and three children. He had two of them leading along, and she one in her arms. The flood met them at their door, and bore them off to a city not made with hands, and they entered heaven together in a moment of time. The waves rolled twenty feet high at a rush.

The memorial service on the Sunday following is worthy of notice. The church bells rang through the ill-fated valley, and called together the weakened congregations to unite in memorial service for those who perished in the flood. The Congregational church was beautifully draped, and many empty pews in black and white, with floral offerings interwoven, which told their own story. Around the pulpit were placed wreaths and crosses of wild flowers—memorials for distinguished individuals in other places. The text given out for this occasion was very appropriate—from Jeremiah xlvii, 2: "Behold, waters rise up out of the north, and shall be an overwhelming flood, and shall overwhelm the land, and all that is therein; the city and them that dwell therein; and then the men shall cry, and all the inhabitants of the land shall howl." The Methodist church and all others were appropriately addressed on this occasion of universal mourning. Perhaps you have all these notices more fully described and published, but I send this in case you have not.

This section of our country has been remarkably cold for the season. The fruit-trees are now just in full bloom, and the forest-trees not fully clad in their livery of green. The air is fresh and invigorating, calculated to give health and animation to drooping spirits and languishing frames. In Massachusetts the month of June changes the whole face of nature, and the long days bring forth vegetation like a magical wand, and presents its varied shades of beauty in every prospect to charm the eye in hill and dale.

Incendiary spirits are here as well as in the South. There have been some terrible fires in this quiet, classical village. A barn, contiguous to this elegant boarding establishment, with its invaluable treasures, was entirely consumed, with all its horses, cows, and the other essential articles for its use. In the neighborhood two other barns of great value, seventeen cows and five horses were consumed by the three fires. Most astonishing circumstance! Fortunately no dwelling-house caught the flames.

Our Memphis Letter.

MR. EDITOR: Upon the literary horizon of the Memphis Conference two authors have just dawned—Dr. S. W. Moore, of Brownsville, author of "Our Church in Sandburg," and Mr. R. W. Blew, publisher of the Western Methodist, author of "Uncle Bob."

"Our Church in Sandburg" has been compared to "Post Oak Circuit." Between these two books there is very little in common. Each fills a place, but neither can fill the place of the other. "Sandburg" is a record of what was actually said, of what was actually done. "Post Oak" is a record of that and more—of those sentiments and thoughts that are too hideous to be expressed, yet which do give birth and tone to actions. The one, an efficient and elegant reaper of the ripened harvest; the other, a thorough analysis of the soils that produce the crop.

The first two-thirds of "Sandburg" indicate an author fresh, buoyant and full of his subject; the last third suggests a weary hand and brain—heat, musquitoes, with here and there beneath the surface a "I wish it was finished." However, there is a classic finish about this book that makes it an ornament to Methodist literature.

"Uncle Bob."—The title suggests a fat, good-humored, patriarchal sort of man. But the author is no such thing. He is not fat, only tolerably good-humored; but he is a father. But the title does indicate the contents of "Uncle Bob." It is a fat, good-humored, patriarchal production, if such epithets may be applied to a book. The young folks will read "Uncle Bob" with delight, and "Uncle Bob" will be a benefit to the young folks, and old ones too.

Now that we are speaking of literature, we cannot pass without a notice of the Southern Quarterly Review. About one year since we heard the Hon. Jefferson Davis make the following remark: "Sir, I am a regular reader of that Review. When I read that article entitled 'The Future of Southern Methodism,' I wrote to Mr. Bledsoe, stating that it was the best article he had ever written." Mr. Bledsoe replied: "It is the best, if I had written it. I did not write it. I am not capable of writing such an article. Bishop Marvin wrote it." A periodical so highly esteemed by so great a man and scholar should not lack for appreciation among Southern Methodists.

But how is our church literature to reach the people? Is the knotty question. Formerly it was done through the preachers; but not now. We will not discuss why they no longer sell books. The publications of the secular press reach the people. Why may not ours? Why not use their method—agents as canvassers? They make special inducements to these agents. Why may not we?

Other religious denominations have tried this plan, and they have succeeded. One agent for the Christian Union made several hundred dollars commissions in this city in a few months. In every Southern city and town there are ladies who are compelled to live by their own exertions. Many avenues of business are closed to them; the others are more than supplied. For every school there are as many as five applicants. The shops can give only a tithe of them employment, and the sewing machine yields but a scant support. Would not the pastors in our cities and towns do well to organize this class of indigent ladies into a board of canvassers to solicit sales for our literature? Would not our publishers and authors do well to offer such liberal commissions for their services? It occurs to us that the large profits on small sales would be more than compensated by small profits on large sales. S.

PRIZE ESSAY.—The publisher of the Central Methodist, Catlettsburg, Ky., makes the following proposition:

For the best essay upon the duty of the ministry to see that at least one of our church papers is taken by every family connected with their respective charges, and the obligations of the official members to assist in this work, together with suggestions as to the best method for the accomplishment of this end, not to exceed sixteen pages foolscap, received by the first of September, I will pay $25 in cash.

Each competitor will be required to send his name and address with the manuscript, in a sealed envelope, bearing the marks of the manuscript.

The essays received will be placed in the hands of a competent committee, and when they shall agree as to the one entitled to the premium, the envelope will be opened, and the writer and public duly advised.

It is mutually agreed that all the manuscripts sent on this proposition are to be my property.

A CHURCH SUIT DECIDED.—The Brush Creek camp ground property, in Washington county, which has been held by the Methodist Episcopal Church since the war, but claimed by the Methodist Episcopal Church South, consisting of four acres of land and church and parsonage, near Johnson City, was lately decreed by Chancellor Smith to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, with rents from commencement of the suit. The Church South was represented by I. E. Reeves, S. J. Kirkpatrick, F. W. Earnest and H. H. Carr, who deserve and have the thanks of the church for their able and successful prosecution of the suit.—Holston Methodist.

The Woman Question.

To Methodists it sounds rather strange that the privilege of women to speak and pray in the social meetings of the church should be matter of grave discussion in a venerable assembly of Christian divines. They may sing in choir and congregation, teach in the Sunday school, and be in many ways seen and heard, but they must not pray in the prayer meeting! Much of the power and progress of Methodism is undoubtedly due to the fact that our women have always taken part in the exercises of our devotional meetings. As evangelists and preachers they may have no divine vocation, save in a few extraordinary cases possibly, but in the love-feast, the class meeting and the prayer meeting their gifts, graces and usefulness are unquestionable. From the proceedings of the Presbyterian Assembly, recently in session at St. Louis, we make the following extract:

The committee further reported an overture from the presbytery of Rock River. They ask: Does the Assembly mean to enjoin that in the regular weekly prayer meeting of the church no woman shall speak or lead in prayer? It was recommended that the Assembly answer yes, except in emergencies, to be decided by the pastor or session.

Judge Drake wished the exception omitted.

The Rev. Robert Alkman, of Madison, New Jersey, thought the exception was the best thing in the report, but offered an amendment that, inasmuch as there was considerable doubt upon the subject, this whole question should be referred to the sanctified common sense of the ministers and elders of the church. He did not believe that the apostle meant to prohibit women from speaking in prayer meeting, and he said this the more freely because his own church did not practice it, and because, in the prayer meetings of his church, as in others, there were generally half a dozen women to one man. He asked the members of the Assembly if they "poured oil upon the sick," and prayed over them, or if it was a universally accepted idea among Presbyterians that it was wrong for a man to wear long hair; yet in one great synod of this church nearly all the members wear their hair way down their backs. He referred to China. But the apostle declares these things with as much emphasis as he does the declaration under consideration.

The Rev. Thomas P. Hunt said: Just as sure as you pass this resolution we will have a pile of overtures from all parts of the country wanting to know what "sanctified common sense" means. He never yet found a man who knew what common sense was. When a man talks about a thing being opposed to common sense or public sentiment, he simply means that it is opposed to his own opinions.

The Rev. H. G. Blinn, of the presbytery of Troy, took ground in opposition to the deliverances of former assemblies on this subject. He did not believe that the lips of women should be sealed in the weekly prayer meetings, as if she had no soul and no responsibility to God. To-day woman is the strongest element in the church. The prayer-killers generally wear pantaloons. It would be unwise in the church to reconsider its past action. To a woman who differed from her husband on this subject he gave the advice that she should obey her husband at home.

It was suggested that the word "discretion" be substituted for "sanctified common sense," and Mr. Alkman accepted the suggestion.

The report was then referred to a special committee, consisting of Rev. Drs. R. K. Richardson, E. L. Hurd, W. T. Findley and J. O. Murray, Rev. J. Lewis, and Messrs. W. P. Orbison and A. Whilldin.

The report of the same committee on the question of "woman's rights" was taken up, and the discussion unexpectedly developed a large amount of feeling in favor of greater liberty to women in social meetings. The special committee to whom the several substitutes suggested were referred made a report, for which a substitute, proposed by Rev. Robert Alkman, was adopted, 211 to 84, as follows:

Resolved, That in response to overture 24 this Assembly expresses no opinion as to the scriptural view of woman's right to speak or pray in the social prayer meeting, and commits the whole subject to the discretion of the pastors and elders of the church. (Loud and long-continued applause.)

SEASHORE CAMP GROUND.—The board of trustees will meet on the camp ground on Wednesday next the first day of July, to attend to important business in reference to the approaching camp meeting, to commence on Friday, the twenty-fourth of July.

Persons intending to tent at the camp meeting are requested to meet the trustees and have their lots therefor assigned them, and all others interested, or desiring information in reference to the camp meeting, are invited to be present.

By order of the board.

THE SEED AND THE SOWERS.

Ever so little the seed may be,
Ever so little the hand,
But when it is sown it must grow, you see,
And develop its nature, weed, flower or tree;
The sunshine, the air and the dew are free
At its command.

If the seed be good, we rejoice in hope
Of the harvest it will yield,
We wait and watch for its springing up,
Admire its growth, and count on the crop
That will come from the little seeds we drop
In the great wide field.

But if we heedlessly scatter wide
Seeds we may happen to find,
We care not for culture or what may betide,
We sow here and there on the highway side;
Whether they've lived or whether they've died,
We never mind.

Yet every sower must one day reap
Fruit from the seed he has sown,
How carefully, then, it becomes us to keep
A watchful eye on the seed, and seek
To sow what is good, that we may not weep
To receive our own!

Lend a Helping Hand.

MR. EDITOR: It is said that one-half of the world know not how the other half live. It is also said that one-fifth of the people on the globe are in want and need assistance. It is said, again, that the people of America are the happiest and most independent people on earth. If so, how thankful should they be. With what gratitude should they thank Heaven for casting their lot in such a land. We live in a beautiful country. Our lands are fertile, and adapted to the growth of almost every variety of vegetation. Water as pure as can gush forth from the earth is found. A climate of any imaginable temperature is within the bounds of our happy land. Scenery as grand and magnificent as the human eye ever beheld is gorgeously displayed in our republic. Matchless rivers of stupendous magnitude are majestically threading their course through our valleys to cheer the weary traveler and quench the thirst of the wild beasts of the fields. Affluent and populous cities and towns dot our land from east to west. Floating palaces glide on the placid bosoms of our beautiful rivers. Magnificent steamers ride over the splendid lakes of the North. Locomotion drives with lightning speed the bountiful harvests of our farms from city to city. Truly we have a happy country; surely the people are and should be happy.

But is every one who claims this land as a home blessed with happiness? Are there not those whose misfortunes have cut off from them everything that is pleasurable and cheerful? Do not those live among us who have been bowed down by disappointment and adversity, and in whose heart there is not the least ray of hope for happiness? Can we not find in our wealthy cities those who have forsaken the narrow paths of rectitude, and have gone into degradation and shame, without the least ray of hope for recovery? Who can tell the myriads of immortal souls that are in despair to-day, that are writhing in the bitterest agony of woe, because no one came to their rescue, and with kindness gave a helping hand? Who has not seen a reeling, drunken sot ushering himself into an inebriate's grave, that might have been saved by lending a helping hand when he was struggling with all of his combined efforts to surmount the barriers that plunged him into the gulf? Thousands of once happy creatures are to-day in wretchedness, in want. Many, many of them could have been spared this misery had some one, in time of trial, gallantly stepped forth and offered a helping hand—a kind, a soothing word. 'Tis a little thing to speak a kind word, to let fall upon the care-worn heart a soft and honest tear; yet how it nerves the despoiling spirit, how it cheers the drooping, withered heart, and shines upon the wretched soul of him or her who is alone in the world. It is to the desolate and bereaved pilgrim what the gentle shower is to the withered flower. It costs nothing to be kind. The reward is magnanimous. Who can describe what heaven will be to that one who, by some gentle, consoling counsel, by a helping hand, has been the means of securing for a deserted outcast a crown at the right hand of him who holds the destiny of nations in the hollow of his hand? Through the ceaseless ages of eternity the poor outcast will sing the anthems of endless glory, and in melodious strains of grateful thanks will echo through the vaults of heaven and in the ears of the reseuer: "You are the means, in the hands of God, of my ineffable felicity."

To the wayward lend a helping hand. To the troubled heart give the soothing and consoling balm of a sympathizing, helping hand. To the forsaken and stricken outcast give a kind and cheering word, and with a generous, helping hand lead them back to happiness. To the poor, who have not the comforts of life, kindly offer a helping hand, and thereby administer to their want. To the aged and tottering one place a helping hand, and gladly sustain the trembling clay, for it will not remain long. To the erring prodigal speak in tones of love. To the unfortunate tippler lend a helping hand, and implore him to "go and sin no more."

O ye upon whom the opulence of the earth has been lavished in gilded profusion, ye whose hearts have never throbbed with anxious care, ye who luxuriate in costly palaces, are there not those whom you could assist—are there not those whose suffering you could mitigate by extending to them a helping hand? Heaven demands such generosity. Humanity and all that is noble speak in thunder-tones for a helping hand.

Spiritual Worship.

There is something in form. It gives tone and health and order and decency to God's service. It tends to control and settle the thoughts. It helps to lift the heart up to the Father. It gives an outward expression to the inward sentiment. When one bows down in prayer it is to express humility and reverence. It acts as a monitor and guard over the meditations. But that there is virtue in the mere bowing, certainly no one will assert. The trouble at this point is that worship will become merely perfunctory. And while impressive ceremony and expressive form are in harmony with God's majesty, yet they are valuable only as they help to a right worship. They are auxiliary only. The moment this line is left they become degraders of the soul. In ratio as men get away from a pure spiritual worship, they increase in number and magnificence, form and ceremony. None excelled the pagans in this. In more modern times, in purely Catholic countries, we see a painful substitution of pictures, images, forms and ceremonies for the simple worship of almighty God. In the first place, there can be nothing satisfactory to God in this mode or in these vehicles of worship. He is a spirit, and those who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. To imagine that he could be pleased with such an outward, hollow semblance of devotion must be to suppose him altogether such an one as ourselves. This is the folly of the fool, who says in his heart there is no God. It is the contempt of the fool, who asks: Doth God see, doth God know? It is a degrading of his name, a belittling of his nature.

Not satisfactory to God, it cannot by any possibility meet the demands of the soul itself. A spiritual substance cannot subsist on material food. The body is sustained upon the produce of earth. It is of the earth earthy. The mind, while connected with the body, partakes more or less of its sympathies and enjoyments. Through the senses beautiful sights, harmonious sounds and pleasant sensations are brought to it. But the purely spiritual man cannot enter into these gross and material things. To seek to feed the soul religiously—to seek the pardon of sin and the peace of God through harmonious sounds, lighted candles, magnificent gilt altars, dazzling pictures, oft kneelings and oft risings, standings or sittings—is simply a mockery; is to offer a stone for bread, and a scorpion for an egg.

In addition to the personal discomfort and final ruin produced, there is to be considered the fatal influence exercised in the meantime. Great stress is laid upon the work to be done by the Christian through his saving influence. The light is to shine, through him demonstrating the truth and glorifying the Father. His conversation is to be in heaven. He is to be as salt. He is to walk worthy of his vocation, proving what is that good and acceptable will of God. This applies to the real Christian. The man with the form, however perfect, is without the power. The nominal Christian cannot exercise this saving influence. The formal professor will be intuitively discerned by those around him. There will be wanting zeal and holy earnestness. His very face will manifest the absence of sanctifying love. The hungry, starving soul will be seen in the man's life. He goes down to death under the horrible delusion that he is saved—fails in the object of his creation in failing to save himself and those around him. T.

Some Sinful Things.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of May 7, in a communication to your paper while on your way to the General Conference, you say: "The horse-race is to-day one of the most pernicious institutions in the world, and next to if not ahead of the lottery business as a means of dissipation and corruption." Again you say: "The round dance, we were informed, was by all odds the most popular and fascinating—a most indecent and evil thing, it would seem, but still indorsed and practiced by the fashionable world;" and you might have added: "By members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South." It is sadly so; but, what is more sad, some of our ministers have not the moral courage to enforce the discipline of the church against this thing. The evils referred to in your communication are assailing the church at this time in the persons and practice of its members, and threaten in some places to disorganize and demoralize the church members and ministers. Members visit the race-track to witness the races, they buy lottery tickets, they openly engage in rafiling, they dance all the figures from No. 1 to No. 8 inclusive. What is to be done? But tell me, how are these things to be put down as long as ministers and members deal in life insurance policies, attend fairs where there are racing, drinking, gambling and what not? Just tell me what is the system of life insurance but a decent and doubtful method of indulging in lotteries and futures? Do you know that many members of the church invest in cotton and gold futures? It has been done largely; some have even failed in business by doing so. The fact is, all these modes of trying to make money are delusive and killing operations, and therefore immoral and vicious. I speak plainly. It is time not only to speak so, but to act so. The very foundations of the church are being sapped and undermined by these decent and worldly modes of making money and enjoying pleasure. I agree fully with your sentiments, and with all those who in simplicity live up to them in the fear and faith of God. In some places the world is trying to drag the membership of the church into suppers and parties to dance over the graves of the Confederate dead, in order to raise money for memorial associations. Let the church in all its power strike at the root of all these evils, and put her face like flint against the very appearance of them.

Suppose we do lose a few members; would it not be better to lose a few than to delude the many, and break down the purity of the church? It is time that "judgment should begin at the house of God." We must draw the lines sharply between the church and the world—between dram-drinking, dancing, horse-racing, theater-going, lottery dealing, and the pure religion of the God of our fathers, of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. May God help the few who stand up to the strictest profession and practice of our holy religion. Deal gently and kindly, but firmly and justly. As children cannot be properly trained without discipline, neither can a church be prepared for the life eternal without it. See what became of the children of good old Eli, and of David too. I hope these ideas will not be considered too severe or strait to find a place in your columns.

Presiding Elders and Their Support.

MR. EDITOR: If it is not too late, I ask to be indulged in a thought or two upon this subject. In the Western Methodist of April 18 appeared a communication from the Rev. W. P. Barton, magnifying the presiding elder's office and the support of its incumbents. The magnifying of the office itself, and the necessity of the presiding elder's support, I can fully indorse. It does seem so plain that the presiding eldership is a necessary element in our Methodist Episcopacy, in order to overlook the district, to change and relieve improper preachers, to call to trial, suspend or expel preachers for misdemeanors and immoral conduct, to investigate the case of any traveling preacher under reproach of anything forbidden in the word of God, and to report the acceptability and qualifications of preachers for special work—"the dry preachers, the inexperienced preachers," etc.—together with the necessities and claims of stations, circuits and missions, to the appointing power. No blazing star could be plainer on a moonless night than the necessity of presiding elders to accomplish all this, unless bishops are increased to a multitude equal to the present number of presiding elders. The attendance of the presiding elder at Quarterly Conference adds a vim and interest to the work when the occasion is properly magnified; but, isolated, it dwindles into a mere incident when compared with those other items, in their bearing upon the success and prosperity of the cause. These are the bishop's deputies—his representatives in the authority, dignity and administration of his office—and through them he works his general superintendency. Certainly the bishops should have a deciding voice as to who is and who is not to represent him in all these interests in his absence. It is true that men have been appointed to this office who have not had but the slightest conception of what their position imported, who arrogated to themselves the dignities and honors of the office, without apprehending their duties and responsibilities. Such appointments are unfortunate, but they should not affect the principle involved any more than that the appointment of Saul, the son of Kish, to the government of Judah and Israel should sustain an argument that God ought to have nothing to do in the control of kings or the rule of kingdoms. That presiding elders, in their present mode of creation and manner of exercising office, in their main feature, should survive intermittably all church legislation, and that they ought to be supported, I can fully indorse with Bro. Burton.

Upon the item of magnifying their support, or paying them more on account of their office, I cannot indorse, and regard it as at war with the genius of Methodism. "Allowance" and "support" are the words, humiliating as they are. "Salary" and "emoluments" are innovations, and bring a secular odor with them. It was certainly never intended to make the office of bishop and presiding elder signs of increased pay to the preacher. Certainly such a thought never had birth in the sanctified hearts and fertile brains of those who first planned the organization of Methodism. It is clear that such a thought was never breathed upon the pages of early Methodist history. Nor can a just claim for such increased pay be founded upon the word of God. The argument—if it be an argument—founded upon the analysis of grading the pay of bishop, presiding elder and preacher, as governor, secretary and sheriff, or as general, colonel and captain, would certainly ally it with the secular aspects of those civil and military offices, and call as certainly for legislation to specify the salaries of the higher and lower incumbents of office. If such a thing is to be practiced in our administration, it ought to be legislated upon, so as to make the matter clear and of legal force. If a motion were made, upon the General Conference floor, looking directly to this thing, what bishop have we who would not groan, being burdened in spirit with fearful apprehensions? Then what would be done with the ex-presiding elders?

No, Bro. Barton, we are entitled to a support, and then we must gather souls for our hire; and he who gathers the largest number of these will don the higher honors of heaven awarded to the "faithful servant," and wear the brightest crown, studded with jewels, as he has won souls to Christ. "When we awake from the dust, they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."—Daniel xii, 3.

JOSEPH D. NEWSOM.

THE THREE THOUGHTS.—"Weel, aunty, what are your thochts about marryin'?" said a young lass of seventeen one day to a decent spinster, who had reached the shady side of life without committing matrimony. "Deed, lassie," frankly replied her relative, "I hae had but three thochts about it a' my days, an' the last is like to be the langest. First, when I was young, like yoursel', I thocht, 'Wha'll I tak?' then, as the time began to wear by I began to think, 'Wha'll I got?' an' after I got my leg broken wi' that whumel oot o' Saunders McDrouthie's cart, my thocht syne was, 'Wha'll tak me?' and I doot I'll hae tae think the same thocht till I gang to my grave, unless something happens mair by ordinar."

A Fine Sermon "Smashed."

The following actual incident is illustrative of the modern practice of spiritualizing texts of Scripture, and giving them a meaning foreign to that intended by the inspired writer.

A young preacher—a graduate of one of the theological schools of the country—preached a very nice discourse from the following words: "Then, fearing lest they should fall upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day."—Acts xvi, 29.

Said the young preacher: "The ship represents the church. The four anchors are faith, hope, love and prayer. Christians are the crew. The sea represents the great ocean of life. The storm that prevailed are the trials to which we are incident here, and the Island of Melita, where they all escaped safe to land, means heaven." The preacher dwelt with becoming fervency on the importance of casting out the anchors, faith, hope, love and prayer, the necessity of abiding in the ship in order to be saved, and the consolation to be found in the fact that not a hair of their heads should be hurt, but that they (the members of the church) should all reach shore in safety. The preacher concluded by asking one of our aged preachers, whom he had invited into the pulpit out of respect to his gray hairs, to close the meeting with a few remarks. The old brother arose and placed his hand on the young theologian's head as if giving him a phrenological examination, and proceeded, in his plain, uneducated style, substantially as follows:

"My young brother, you have preached us a mighty purty discourse to-day, but I'm afeared you've made some awful big mistakes. You said that the ship meant the church. If that's so, we haven't got any church now, for the ship was all smashed to pieces and destroyed. You also said that the four anchors were faith, hope, love and prayer. If that's so, we haven't got any faith, hope, love and prayer in the church, as they have been cast out. And you said that Christians are the crew. If that's so, they are a mighty bloodthirsty set, for they wanted to kill Paul. You tell us also that the Island of Melita meant heaven. Well, if that's true, heaven must be a mighty snakey place, as one bit Paul as soon as he landed."

It is stated as a historical fact that the young preacher was never known to preach that "purty" discourse again in all that region of country.—Bible Banner.

Animals Slandered by Man.

There is a fine irony in the use we make of the terms "brutal" and "beastly," "manly" and "humane." As no brute ever kicks its mate to death, nor any beast makes itself drunk, it is a happy use of language by which our police reports invariably qualify the first class of outrage as "brutal," and the condition of a tipsy man wallowing in the gutter as "beastly." On the other hand, it is by a pretty if not well-deserved compliment to ourselves that we describe the courage transcendently displayed by a hen on behalf of her chickens as pre-eminently "manly;" and when we have occasion to speak of compassionateness, complacently call the quality "humanity," as if the race from which have sprung all the Herods, Neroes, Alvas and Majendies of ancient and modern times, were quite incapable of cruelty.

In one of Æsop's fables, charmingly rendered by La Fontaine, a lion is shown a picture wherein a man stands triumphant over one of the animal's own kind which he has just vanquished. The four-footed critic in the fable simply remarks:

Avec plus de raison nous en rions le dessus
Si mes confreres savaient peindre.

We may readily imagine the transposition of terms of praise and blame which would follow were the promised experiment of teaching poor Joe (the Chimpanzee in the Zoological Gardens) the language of the deaf and dumb to prove successful, and an age of talking animals to be inaugurated. How the eminently sensible goose and the calm-judging ass would recalcitrate against the use of their names as synonyms of stupidity and folly! How those affectionate and faithful comrades—rats—would repudiate the use of the term "ratting" as signifying treachery! How those quarrelsome and loosely-conducted birds, the doves, would coo satirically under their wings at our romantic ascription to them of innocence and fidelity! And how one and all would hoot, snort, bray and cackle at the utter absurdity of attaching to the word "human" any other sense than that of consummate perfidy and merciless destructiveness!—New Quarterly Review.

IN THE year 1846 a second lieutenant of Landwehr lancers was returning, attended by his servant, from some field maneuvers in Pomerania. On their way to quarters they put their horses to the gallop, and when they came close to the brink of the Starltzsee, along the side of which the road went, the servant's horse suddenly shied, and threw his rider over his head into deep water. The man could not swim, and the officer sprang from his horse, jumped after the drowning person, and brought him safely to the bank. They had to ride a long way still in their wet clothes to quarters, and the officer caught a chill, which gave him rheumatism for life. The servant has never left his master's employ, but is now a shepherd on his estate; the officer wears the medal for saving life, with many other orders, on his breast, and his name and title are Prince Bismarck.

NEVER fail to do daily that good which lies next to your hand. Trust God to weave your little thread into the great web, though the pattern shows it not yet. The grand harvest of the ages shall come to its reaping, and the day shall broaden itself to a thousand years, and the thousand years shall show themselves as a perfect and finished day.—McDonald.

Obituaries.

ELIZABETH REGAN was born in Robeson county, North Carolina, March 22, 1802, and was married to Stephen A. Regan January 8, 1818. She soon afterward joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she was a faithful member until her death. Though Sister Regan was old and infirm, she never ceased to work for the glory of God and the good of mankind until she was called to a higher and nobler field. Early on the morning of January 30, 1874, she was sent for to visit and relieve the suffering. She rode three or four miles on horseback, and appeared cheerful, lively and well until she alighted and went into the house. But she immediately complained of difficulty of breathing, walked about the room a few minutes and laid down. In answer to the inquiry, "Do you feel any pain?" she said, "I believe that I am dying," and folded her hands upon her breast and ceased to breathe. Sister Regan was faithful to her fellow-men in all her relationships, and, above all, she was faithful to her God.

MRS. ELIZABETH J. CROSS, daughter of Lewis and Sarah Hall, and wife of Richard H. Cross, was born in Duplin county, North Carolina; moved with her parents to Lowndes county, Alabama, in 1825; was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1829, and died April 14, 1874.

"Aunt Bettie," as she was familiarly called, was a true woman in all her relations in life. She sustained the relation of mother to her orphan nephews, and well did she act her part. We pray God that they may never forget her counsels and the pious example she set before them. She was charitable to all churches, but loved her own best. At her house the people of God found a home, and the ministers of Argus circuit will ever remember Aunt Bettie. She told me, a month before she died, that she only feared the pain of dying. Her seat around the family altar was vacated only a few days before she died. Her aged husband still lives, only waiting, till the shadows are a little longer grown, to be summoned to a happy reunion with her whose life was exemplary and whose death was without fear.

MRS. EMMA MCKINION was born March 3, 1851, and died in Alabama, March 29, 1874.

When quite young she joined the Baptist Church, but when she grew to womanhood she became dissatisfied, from some cause, with her experience as a Christian. Not only this, but, as she remarked, she "was alarmed at the thought of being a hypocrite." She was deeply penitent for days, and prayed almost incessantly that she might have the true evidence of her pardon. She sought peace and pardon in the blood of the world's Redeemer, which blood cleanseth from all sin. She was most powerfully blessed. All doubts were banished from her mind, and the love of God was shed abroad in her heart. She loved God and all his people. This was in the fall of 1870. In the same year she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Bethel, Calhoun county, Alabama. From this time till death released her from the toils and sorrows of life she was an exemplary Christian, full of faith and the Holy Ghost.

In all the relations of life she exemplified the truth and reality of the Christian religion. Her disposition was that of consecrated and holy meekness, and thus she gained the affections of all who knew her.

MRS. ELIZABETH BICKHAM was born November 11, 1823; married to T. C. Bickham January 30, 1840, and died March 28, 1874. Sister Bickham had suffered with consumption for ten years, but was confined to her bed only about five months. She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South in early life, and lived a faithful member of the same until her death. She was one of those Christians whose walk and conversation showed to whom she belonged. If she was not at church I felt sure that she was not able to get there. Sister Bickham was true in all her relationships. As a Christian she walked with God; and few, yea, very few, equaled her as a wife and mother. Bro. Bickham had preceded her to the better land some years, leaving her in charge of their children, which charge she faithfully performed. She was the mother of thirteen children. Two had crossed over before her, and eleven live to mourn her loss. Sister Bickham was one of those Christians whose light grows brighter and brighter as she neared the tomb. The writer often visited her during her illness, and always found her leaning upon her God. Just before she died she called her children around her and said: "Children, I do not know what to say to you. Lord, I leave them in thy hands. Receive my spirit;" and she ceased to breathe.

THE REV. THOMAS P. CRYMES was born in South Carolina, February 7, 1822, and died May 25, 1874, at his residence near Brooksville, Mississippi, after a painful illness of seven weeks' duration. He was educated at Erskin College, in South Carolina; converted in October, 1839, at a camp meeting in Chambers county, Alabama, and admitted on trial in the Alabama Conference in 1847. Owing to the loss of the journal of the old Alabama Conference, and the absence of the General Minutes, a list of his appointments on circuits and stations cannot be given by the writer. He traveled in the Alabama Conference until the Mobile Conference was formed, and in the Mobile Conference until the North Mississippi Conference was set off, and in the North Mississippi Conference until 1872, when he located in consequence of feeble health. He was an effective itinerant from 1847 to 1872, with the exception of one or two years, and then he obtained a supernumerary relation.

Bro. Crymes was an able preacher—well educated, thoroughly in theology and general literature. He excelled as a preacher in clearness of his statements of doctrines of Christianity, and in logical manner in which he defended them. He preached the doctrines of Christianity. While in the regular work he had sometimes the power of the Holy Spirit to such a degree that he preached with great power.

After he located and became involved in business he did not attend to religion as he once did, though he was true to his calling and the church of God amid these seasons of spiritual gloom. During the first few weeks of his last illness he was under such deep spiritual distress that it was painful to his brethren and friends to hear him talk of his condition, though he said all the time he did "not feel that God was angry with him," but there was the absence of "joy in the Holy Ghost." He asked them to pray for a removal of the joys of God's salvation, and this was the burden of his own prayers until the victory came, and it was from that time until death, as he often expressed it, "at peace with God and all the world." He died without a fear of the future, but certain of a home in heaven.

Bro. Crymes was a good husband and a kind and indulgent father. His greatest concern was for his youngest son, whom he dedicated to God in a special sense from his birth, and died expressing the hope that God would call him to the work of the ministry. Bro. Crymes leaves a wife and five children.

R. M. POWER.

DIED, at his residence in Tallahatta, Clarke county, Alabama, on the fifth of December, 1873, after a protracted and painful illness, JOHN ROBINSON COX, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South for fifteen or twenty years. He loved the church of his choice and the Alabama Conference had in him a better steward. His Masonic funeral was preached at Tallahatta church on the fourth Sabbath in May, by the Rev. George F. Ellis, who had served as his pastor for four years. The many moistened eyes during the discourse, and the large concourse of people that followed the funeral procession to his last resting place, gave evidence how dear he was held in the memory of a people that knew and loved him in other days. During Bro. Ellis' remarks he said that our dear brother was a preacher of righteousness, although he did not speak in the public assembly; but from his blameless life and noble traits of character his influence and examples would live commensurate with eternity. The writer knew the subject of this memoir since 1859, and has been his family physician since 1861, and he never knew a more courteous gentleman or devoted Christian. When the writer first formed his acquaintance he was his father, Matthew Cox, who has long since been called to his home above, and the sainted Carter, who was building Tallahatta church. Four years after the death of his father and the beloved Carter, who was then a co-laborer in his Master's vineyard, the church at this place had but one male member and a few female members; but we thank God that he lived to see her altars crowded with penitents, and more than one hundred members partaking of the bread and drinking of the wine in commemoration of the death and sufferings of our blessed Master. He was a successful farmer, and his barns and storehouses were ever filled with plenty. He was liberal with his means, and ever ready to lend a helping hand or succor to those in distress. The poor loved him, for he never turned them away empty. His house was ever the home of the itinerant preacher, and he did everything within his power to make them comfortable and happy while partaking of his generous hospitalities. His memory will ever be held sacred by Kirk, Powers, Ellis and Wade, who served as his pastors, and who can testify of his noble traits and many virtues.

Bro. Cox was confined to his room seven or eight months, and during all his suffering I never heard him murmur or complain. He bore all his afflictions, and the many severe trials that came upon him in his last days, with Christian resignation. A month or more before he was called to his home above he asked his wife to send for Bro. W. S. Wade, his pastor, for he wanted to see him again, and hear him sing and pray and talk to him of the joys of heaven. After his pastor visited him he became perfectly willing to die, and said if it was his Master's will he would be glad to go. He talked to the writer, a short time before he crossed the last river, of the joys of heaven, and said: "How happy we will be when we all get up there where there will be no sickness, sorrow, pain nor death!" He said he had a father, a brother and sisters waiting and watching to greet him on the other shore. Mother, weep not for your son; wife, weep not for your husband; children, weep not for your parent; sisters, weep not for your brother; friends, mourn not over his departure; but live faithful, follow his examples as he followed Christ, and you will meet him again by the "side of the beautiful river," in "the sweet by and by." We feel in his death that our church has lost one of its strongest pillars, Clarke county one of her best citizens, Alabama one of her noblest sons; but we humbly bow in submission to that all-wise Being who doeth all things well.

THE GOLDEN RULE.—The golden rule teaches us to do unto others as we would have others do unto us. At the same time it teaches us not to expect from our neighbors what we would not be willing, in similar circumstances, to do for them.

THERE is no real use in riches, except it is in the distribution; the rest is but conceit.—Bacon.

deceiving me. I have seen more of the world than you have, Mariar; and know more of human nature, and I am not in the habit of being deceived. I am glad this has occurred as a lesson to you."

Mariar admitted that she had misjudged the man, and that he was an exception to a rule that she had never found to work wrong before. In fact she might say two rules: The first was that for a stranger he talked too glibly—he seemed too anxious to impress us with what he knew. You observed that he answered but few questions; nor did he talk upon subjects of your suggestion. He impressed me as if he was speaking a piece. And his manners were stagy in the last degree—apparently perfectly at his ease, but yet stiff in his actions. He reminded me so much of those actors we traveled with on the boat; you know I told you that they each looked as though they were on the constant qui vive for the prompter. Well, that is reason number one. Reason number two is that his beard was dyed. You know my feelings on this subject. I never saw an honest man who habitually dyed his beard or hair. In this assertion I do not include those who have blundered for awhile into the folly, nor those henpecked men who are held under subjection by foolish wives, nor old men in their dotage, who use hair-dye because they are too old to see the folly of it. But the great mass of men who use hair-dye are dishonest, and are not safe men to deal with."

"Isn't that a rather sweeping assertion?" I asked.

"No; because such men carry a lie on their face—a lie worse than a spoken one—it is a lie nailed to the masthead. And they seek to deceive any one they come in contact with. It sends a cold chill down my back to hear Deacon —— pray. I always ask myself how good prayers can come from a mouth surrounded by deception."

"Well, but to return to our friend, I think he was really an honest man, and trying to do good in the world. I became very much interested in a family that he was trying to help. It seems that the father is an honest, straightforward man, and was a soap manufacturer in good business. By experimenting he found a new process for making soap—good hard soap, which should not cost the maker over one cent a pound. Just think of it! Well, he commenced to make the new soap, and to furnish his customers with a superior article of soap for a nominal price, when he could just as well have charged the old prices.

"His action bid fair to ruin the other dealers of it; this man offered to let them use his receipt; but they must bring down the price. They offered him $50,000 for the exclusive use of it; this he refused. And, to make a long story short, they employed one to put chemicals into this man's fat, which would produce an explosion and kill him. The explosion failed to kill him, but it blinded him, and made a cripple of him. And now he is dependent upon selling those receipts for a living, and our friend offered to sell a few for him as he was passing through the country on his travels, and not charge any commission." At this juncture, said I: "Mariar, what did you pay for this receipt?" She answered: "He told me that I must fix my own price. He said his wife paid $15 for it, and she says that she would not part." "How much did you pay, Mariar?"

"Five dollars was all I had."

"Put the light out and come to bed, and don't stand gaping around that way; I am cold," said I.

Before we slept Mariar had the last word:

"Better lose $5 than $30."—Interior.

The Germ-Theory of Disease.

The germ-theory of disease has recently received a most interesting and demonstrative contribution from an eminent German scientist. The communication of his experimental investigations, and the conclusion he has reached; are singularly and strongly confirmed by Helmholtz, on the Continent, and Tyndall, in England. The researches which are so decisive were made by Prof. Binz, of Bonn, with powerful microscopic apparatus, and extend over a period of several years.

Being a victim to a distressing malady—hay fever, so prevalent in May and June in this country—the Bonn Investigator suspected, from the seasonal prevalence of the disease, that it was traceable to the vegetable organisms. Having armed himself with the powerful immersion lens of a Hartnack microscope, he subjected the nasal secretions to analysis. In examining the secretions he uniformly found organism wholly absent, except when suffering with the disease in spring. When laid on the warm stage of the microscope these organic or parasitical bodies were distinctly seen in motion, vibrating backward and forward in life, and, after several days, had evidently increased in size. They adhere tenaciously to the lower cavities of the nose, and can be discharged only by violent sneezing. But the most beautiful part of the research was in the discovery of the remedy for their presence in the human system. On preparing a neutral solution of sulphate of quinine, free from adulteration by cinchona, and applying this to the nostrils with a pipette or simple nose douche, the desired effect was immediately secured. The poisonous action of quinine on infusoria was perfectly brought out, the symptoms of irritation completely disappeared, and the lens revealed the entire absence of animalcule in the subsequent secretions. The results agree with those arrived at in 1870 by Dr. Frickhofer, of Schwalbach, and Prof. Busch, of Bonn, both of whom, with Helmholtz, the great physiologist, have successfully applied quinine for the cure of this parasitical malady.

These highly interesting and beautiful inquiries in medical science, besides establishing the great value of quinine, and providing a remedy for a disease which is extremely distressing, will give an impetus to an investigation which is one of the most promising in modern therapeutics. A distinguished leader of medical thought in New York, in a public address, recently said that if there was "one direction in which progress is now so marked as to constitute a dominant feature of the present state of medicine, and to embrace a new medical idea, it is the origin and propagation of disease by independent organic germs." No late physiological investigation has been so promisingly pushed, and none has offered so many lines of solution for the mysterious epidemics which, from time immemorial, have afflicted man and beast.

The atmosphere is loaded with matter which, however invisible to the naked eye, needs only to be sifted in a strong beam of artificial light to reveal countless particles, each of which may afford a nidus for poisonous infusoria. With greater perfection in optical apparatus this fact will doubtless yet be made more startlingly apparent. But, whatever science can unmask, however alarming it may be, the progress of all remedial and curative processes can only be advanced by such unstinted analysis.

Eminent physicians and original investigators, as M. Pasteur, of the French Academy of Sciences, Prof. Lister, of Edinburg, and others, in their long-continued and exhaustive experiments, reached conclusions harmonious with those of Helmholtz and Tyndall. While it will always be true that doctors will differ, this difference will not impair the enormous practical utility of such researches. The sanitary and medical issues they involve are so manifold and momentous that it would be a grand step in the right direction if a number of eminent microscopists and physicists, well provided with means, could combine their skill for a final solution of the precise problem on which so much depends.—New York Herald.

Ashantee Art.

We are apt to associate with the heathen tribes of Africa a savage, or at any rate a low, barbarous stage in art. This supposition, long shown to be false with reference to Asiatic nations, now seems liable to be contradicted also among the blacks. The following description is given of the treasures of the King of Ashantee, recently brought to England from the plundered palace at Coomassie:

"The thousand ounces of gold gathered in such haste by King Coffee, as the first installment of the indemnity demanded by his English conquerors, furnish many curious and striking illustrations of the artistic development of the native goldsmiths. Their skill in working gold—which appears to be the most common metal of the country—seems, indeed, to be fully equal to that of the best European artists, while their fertility in invention is simply wonderful.

"Among the larger articles brought away by the English is a human head of massive gold, nearly five pounds in weight, a ghastly object, apparently representing the head of a victim gagged for sacrifice. Of a more pleasing character, and more to be preferred as works of art, are two heavy golden griffins, said to have been broken from the King's chair of state. There are besides many badges of office of different styles, some of them massive fibulæ of wrought gold, like those worn by the heralds sent by King Coffee to treat with the English commander, others of various patterns, according to the office of the wearer. That of the King's chamberlain, for example, is distinguished by padlock and keys; the butler's, by cups and bowls, all of solid metal, and, for the most part, castings of exquisite design.

"In addition to these great badges, each of which contains many ounces of pure gold, there are fetish caps ornamented with gold in repoussee work, the golden tops of umbrellas and sticks of office, grotesque lions for the heads of sceptors, golden jawbones, thigh-bones and skulls, a large sacrificial knife with a golden handle, and many indescribable objects which doubtless served their purpose in the fantastic ceremonies of fetish worship.

"Smaller in size but not inferior in workmanship is an infinite number and variety of objects of native design, besides numerous imitations of the gold work of other nations and ages; bracelets, some so heavy as to be a burden, others of exceeding lightness and delicacy; necklaces, chains, pendants, brooches and rings of curious yet beautiful shape.

"The imitated articles give a striking indication of the skill with which the native workmen copy everything that comes to them from the outer world. Thus there are golden padlocks, buckles, bells, and even watch-keys, whose use must have been unknown. Not the least curious are several copies of reliquaries left, perhaps, by Roman Catholic missionaries in that benighted land, and reproduced in gold by the native workmen with a faithfulness and delicacy which a Chinese might envy. Among the brooches, pendants, badges, rings, and so on, there are forms which are almost fac-similes of early Indian ornaments; others approach Egyptian styles; still others Scandinavian and Anglo-Saxon types. The whole world, in fact, has been laid under tribute, and the relics hoarded in this out-of-the-way region.

"Some of the articles are quite new, and still have clinging to them the fine red loam in which they were cast. Others are old and worn, and bear traces of frequent patchings and solderings. One of the most remarkable of the ancient pieces is a finely chased seal ring, the signet being made of an ancient Coptic coin. Two other rings were evidently copied from early English betrothal rings. Some of the necklaces and chains are formed of beautiful shells reproduced in gold, while others represent seeds and fruit. In every case the design is individual, and the beauty of the workmanship refreshing to see, in contrast with the machine-made jewelry worn by modern civilized belles.

"The most noteworthy object in silver brought from Ashantee is an enormous belt or baldrick, to be hung over the neck by a massive chain, crossing the breast diagonally. From the belt depend seven or eight silver sheaths for knives, the use of which it is not difficult to imagine."—New York Methodist.

Scientific.

ACCOUNT has been given in various papers of five fragments of an enormous meteorite in Wisconsin. The sixth fragment of the same meteorite was recently found by Mr. Louis Korb, in the same field where the others were discovered by him, thirty miles north from Milwaukie. It is ten inches long, seven inches wide and four inches thick in its extreme dimensions; weight, 33 pounds (14,971 grammes.) The total weight of all the fragments is 143 pounds. They were found so near each other as to indicate that the explosion by which they were separated took place not far above the surface of the earth. There are no means of knowing the date of the fall of these interesting masses of iron.

PRINTING WITH ANILINE ON COTTON GOODS.—Dissolve fifty grains of glue in one liter of water, and into this drop just enough of a solution of bi-chromate of potash to give it a straw yellow color. To this mass enough aniline dye is added to give it the desired shade, and the solution thickened with starch and dextrine. This mass can be employed for printing directly on muslins and cottons generally. After printing the fabrics are exposed to the direct sunlight for a few hours to set the colors, for bichromatic with glue, gelatine or albumen is rendered insoluble by the action of light. In place of glue an ammoniacal solution of caseine may be employed; glue is, however, the cheapest substance, and preferable on that account.

METEORS.—The gold medal of the British Royal Astronomical Society was presented in February to Signor Schiaparelli for his researches upon the nature and orbits of meteors, which have helped to demonstrate that these bodies belong to the stellar region, and are in fact falling stars. The same savant has pointed out a strong analogy between shooting stars and comets, exhibiting, for instance, a series of remarkable coincidences between the elements of the orbit of the "August meteors" and those of the orbit of Comet 2, of 1862. A similar comparison is made between the November meteors and Comet 1, of 1866. Signor Schiaparelli concludes his memoir by saying: "These approximations need no comment; must we regard these falling stars as swarms of small comets, or rather as the product of the dissolution of so many great comets? I dare make no reply to such a question."

PROF. TYNDALL argues against the commonly taught notion that man requires absolutely pure air and water. Chemically pure air—air that is without a trace of ammonia, carbonic acid or water—is, he says, not to be found, and the one thing certain about it is that, if it were, no one could live on it. Neither is pure water ever found in nature; and observation of the whole animal creation, including man himself, tends to show that pure water is not necessary, nor even demonstrably desirable. Every sunbeam which enters a darkened room shows how thick with solid impurities is the air which man breathes, yet no one on that account fears to breathe it; the same thing holds true in regard to water, but this need not necessarily make any one afraid to drink it. Neither all foreign matters, nor even all foreign organic matters, are of necessity unwholesome; and the votaries of strict science too often represent to us as being who must subsist the world to a series of severe chemical operations before it is fit for him to live in.

THE Austrian Exhibition Gazette calls attention to a new and important industry, viz., the incorporation of rabbits' hair with wool and cotton in weaving textile fabrics. The shorter hairs, which are incapable of being woven, are readily purchased by felt hat manufacturers at $3 a pound. When properly prepared, the hair affords a good strong yarn, which is said to be in no way inferior to wool. If all that the Austrian journal says on the subject be true, the raising of rabbits will soon become an important business. No animal is better adapted to raising on a large scale than the rabbit; they multiply almost as rapidly as white mice, and are not confined to any particular climate. It is rather remarkable that this use of the hair has not been thought of before, particularly when we consider how many hundred million rabbits are annually destroyed. The meat of the rabbit is agreeable and nourishing, and the skins have long been prized. The Austrian Gazette anticipates that an important industry will grow out of the successful introduction of rabbit-hair weaving in all countries.

A BEAUTIFUL RECEPTION.—A Wesleyan missionary in West Africa relates the following: "On the way I was met by the people, and conducted to the mission-house of the Church Missionary Society, where the school children and people surrounded the house, so that nothing would do for them but I must come out, that they might see me and conduct me to the church. On arriving at the church, an immense body of people struck up singing a hymn in Yoruba, and with tearful eyes and throbbing heart I entered the vestry, where I could not but lift up my heart to God in thankfulness and implore divine help in the service. It was a glorious sight; the church inside and outside, windows and doors, was one vast sea of faces, and the singing was the best I heard in Africa, and could not but move the hardest heart. And while I preached from Second Timothy iv, 6-8, through an interpreter, the utmost attention was given. I was safely conducted back to our mission-house by some of the native gentlemen, amid blazing torches to light us on the rough road."

Religious Intelligence.

ON THE twenty-first of May Prof. Swing announced his withdrawal from the Presbyterian Church, assigning as a reason that he could not further endure theological war.

THE General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America met at St. Louis, on Monday, May 21. The Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Pittsburg, was elected moderator.

A VOTE was reached, May 20, in the Presbyterian council engaged in the Swing heresy trial, and resulted in the triumphant vindication of the accused. The vote stood 15 for to 45 against conviction.

IN 1845 the first missionaries settled at Chota Nagpore, India, among the Coles. For five years they labored without seeing any visible fruit. At last four men came, anxious to see Jesus. These became the first fruits of the mission. Now the converts number more than 10,000.

IN ONE of the Methodist Episcopal churches of Chicago—Trinity, we believe—the cornet is used in leading, or at least as an accompaniment, to the music, morning and evening of the Sabbath services. It is pronounced in almost every sense superior to the best cabinet organ. Its notes may be produced with a mellowness and softness equal to those of the flute, while in an instant of time they can be changed to such a compass and loudness that every person in an audience of ten thousand can hear.

THE Southern Presbyterian General Assembly met at Columbus, Mississippi, May 21. The Rev. Dr. Girardeau, of Charleston, South Carolina, was elected moderator. Commissioners from the Synod of Missouri were received. The report of the committee of conference with the Dutch Reformed Church was received. The presbytery of Hong Chow, China, was organized. The attendance was very full; in fact the present Assembly is said to be the largest of this church ever convened, and in point of ability is unsurpassed.

THE two medical missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Japan find access where doors are closed to other missionaries. In their tours through the Shikama district they have required the wealthy Japanese to pay for the medicines prescribed to the poor, and have besides raised $2,500 for three charitable hospitals. "So thoroughly am I convinced," says one of the physicians, "of the pernicious influence which the use of foreign funds will have upon the question of self-support among the churches, that I have felt it my duty to refuse offered gifts from resident foreigners in behalf of the sick poor of certain stations in our field of work.

A LETTER from Mr. Watkins, the missionary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at Guadalajara, Mexico, gives further particulars of the murder of his companion, Mr. Stephens. He was shot by the soldiers who accompanied the mob and to whom he had appealed for protection. One of his converts was taken from the same house and assassinated in the street. Mr. Watkins' life is in considerable danger, and the missionaries in the City of Mexico are meeting for daily intercession in his behalf. It gives us a very disheartening view of Romish Christianity in this country to read the attempted excuses for the murderous conduct of the Romish mob at Ahualulco.

THE Unitarians at Melbourne, Australia, have been driven to appoint a lady as their pastor, and they have no reason to regret their choice. They were for some time without any recognized teacher, and persons nominally belonging to the denomination occasionally forced their way into the pulpit to promulgate peculiar and extravagant views, to the great annoyance of the congregation. To avoid these scandals, a Miss Turner was induced to officiate temporarily, and after a few months' experience she has been formally inducted to the church. She conducts the service without any embarrassment, and her sermons are carefully-prepared essays, quietly delivered. The London Times correspondent who sends the item calls this following an American precedent.

THE Church Missionary Society, which is doing by far the largest work of any of the societies among the Indians of British America, has appointed a missionary to a new station at Fort Francis, between Lake Superior and the Red river settlements. This stretch of country, forming a canoe route of 635 miles, is described as being exceedingly fertile, and the Indians, who from time immemorial have cultivated the land on Garden Island, Lake of the Woods, have never known their crops to have been injured by frost. The Ojibbeway and Chippewuy Indians who inhabit this tract have recently been settled on reservations. Far more inhospitable is the climate at the stations occupied by the society on Hudson's bay. In September last Bishop Harden confirmed 20 Indians at Moose Factory. The supply ship which left in that month for England was stopped by a solid barrier of ice stretching across the entrance to Hudson's bay and obliged to return for the winter. At Metlakahtlah, in the far northern corner of British Columbia, the work is prospering. Two hundred and twenty Indian children attend the schools. At Christmas 250 Indians from Fort Simpson visited Metlakahtlah, were entertained for nine days, and preached to daily, with apparently deep impression.

THE Reformed Episcopal Council adjourned May 19, after a satisfactory week in revision. It will meet next year in Chicago. Bishop Cummins and a layman are to go as delegates to the council of the Free Church of England. Enough money was subscribed during the meeting of the council to publish the prayer-book and furnish it to the churches, to sustain a newspaper organ, to pay the expenses of the Bishop, to keep all the missionaries now in the field and to employ two more, all during the whole of the coming year. Signs of alarm at the progress of the reform movement are to be seen all along the line in the Protestant Episcopal sect. The Church Journal, formerly of the highest order, has suddenly become extremely anti-ritualistic, and would pass muster as a low church paper. Bishop Willmer, of Louisiana, has made ritualism the subject of a long condemnation in his pastoral. Bishop Beckwith, of Georgia, has also spoken against ritualism in his address to the diocesan convention, and has even ventured to declare it more dangerous as well as more sinful than the Cummins movement, and the convention has seconded his condemnation, and has unanimously passed resolutions inviting the General Convention to adopt "practicable measures to put down these practices and teachings that are at variance with our discipline and worship, and that are not authorized directly, or by immediate, necessary implication, by the standards of the church." Resolutions seeking for legislation from the General Convention, to insure uniformity, were offered in the Long Island convention, but were laid on the table. Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania, spoke in his address against the reform movement, but also denounced ritualism, and hoped the General Convention would revise the canons and liturgy so as to suppress it.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The stated meeting of the board of managers was held at the Bible House, Astor Place, on Thursday, the fourth instant, at half-past three o'clock. The decease of Mr. Wm. F. Stearns, one of the managers, was announced. Five new auxiliaries were recognized—in Georgia, South Carolina, Nebraska and Dakota, one each, and one in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Communications were received from Mr. W. L. Thompson, Panama, showing increasing openings for Bible circulation in that region; from Rev. Victor Wittling, Gottenburg, Sweden, with accounts of the mission and statement as to the circulation of books; from Rev. A. L. Blackwood, Rio de Janeiro, and from Mr. Andrew M. Milne, giving an account of the organization of the Brazil Bible Society, auxiliary to the American Bible Society, and with hopeful statements as to the prospects of Bible work in Brazil; from Rev. S. B. Bergne, London, and Rev. Bishop Harris, Bologna, Italy, stating the inability of Bishop Harris to reach London in season for the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, to which he was appointed a delegate from this society; from Rev. Dr. I. G. Bliss, Constantinople, stating some improvement in his health, which still continues feeble; and from Rev. Dr. Schauffler, Constantinople, stating his retirement from the committee of revision of the Turkish Bible. A memorial paper was presented in regard to the decease of Rev. Dr. Thomas DeWitt, and a paper was also read and adopted in regard to W. F. Stearns, Esq. Grants of books were made to the Protestant Episcopal Missionary Society; to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; to the American Board of Commissioners; to the American Tract Society; and to the newly-organized Bible society of Brazil. The total number of books granted is 4,890 volumes, of which 3,542 are for the foreign work, and 9 volumes for the blind. Besides these, others were granted to the value of $720.

COUNCIL OF DUNKARDS.—The National Conference of the Dunkards met at Girard, Illinois, on the twenty-fourth of May. It is estimated that 10,000 persons were present. An enormous tent was erected for their accommodation, capable of holding 5,000 persons, but was found too small, and various religious exercises were held in the shade of the trees, in a large barn and in a church adjacent. The conference continued its services for three days. The proceedings of these eccentric people are not of much general interest, as may be inferred from three topics which were seriously debated. The first was whether it should be made obligatory to salute the colored brethren with a holy kiss, and on this point leave was given to local churches to do as they please. The second was as to members joining farmers' clubs, which was declared inconsistent. The third was as to the use of the piano or other musical instruments, which was pronounced sinful. The conference also decided against a partial shaving of the beard, against sending boys to college and against allowing members to engage in the banking business. The Dunkards hold much the same confession of faith with the Mennonites of Holland. A correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean thus summarizes the peculiarities of their faith and practice: It has been testified that they hold the doctrine of general redemption; yet it is not preached among them in general as an article of faith. They have some peculiarities of manners which may not form a part of their religion, but which they mutually agree to practice. They use great plainness of speech and dress, like the Quakers. Their teachers and bishops wear their beards long and do not shave. They will not go to law, and seldom take interest for money loaned their poorer brethren. They do not vote, and take no part in political affairs. They are not permitted to owe debts to those outside of the church, nor will they assist in arresting horse thieves or fugitives from justice. They are opposed to war from religious principles, and will not be soldiers. They make good, law-abiding citizens, living, so far as possible, within their own church organization. The teachers and deacons are all chosen by vote, and their bishops are selected from among their teachers, after they have been fully tried and found faithful. An elder among the brethren is, in general, the first and eldest-chosen teacher in the congregation, when there is no bishop. They are ordained by prayer and laying on of hands, which is a very solemn and affecting ceremony. In their love-feasts and Lord's Supper services they wash each other's feet, bestow the kiss of charity, and perform other peculiar ceremonies.

Dancing and Liquor Dealing.

HOW TO DEAL WITH THEM.

"In my work the fight is on the delusion of dancing and liquor dealing. But for these evils my charge would be prosperous." So writes a pastor, whose experience, we imagine, is not by any means exceptional. Members of the church attend dancing parties, send their children to dancing schools, and some of the younger members dance, and there are members who are connected with the traffic in liquor. What relation these evils sustain to each other we are not informed, but we suppose that liquor dealers and dancers are alike destitute of experimental religion. The conscience in both classes must be singularly obtuse, and the intelligence anything but clear and comprehensive. Nearly all Christian bodies, Catholic and Protestant, have delivered their testimony against dancing. The best moralists among the heathen were of the same mind. Those who persist in vindicating it, and indulging in it, set themselves up in opposition to the wisdom, piety and virtue of Christianity, and of the best of the pagans. There must be a cause for this uniform condemnation. It must be a great evil, or this protest would not be made.

The modern dance, for one thing, involves an association of the sexes of an unwholesome character, which is dangerous to purity of mind and virtuous conduct. The young are not always capable of fully appreciating this objection, and motives of delicacy sometimes hinder its presentation to those who might understand its force. That thousands who indulge in this amusement are unconscious of these results and tendencies may be true, but there are thousands whose testimony and experience, if delivered, would confirm the statement. There is a difference in the character of the dances and in the company, but the tendency is from the modest and chaste to those that are disgusting and offensive, and from select and private companies to promiscuous assemblies. The abominable displays in the cabins of steamboats and in the parlors of fashionable hotels are sufficient proof. The growing licentiousness of the age, and the lamentable decay of virtue in these times, are largely owing to this single form of worldly gayety and pleasure. It is because it is inimical to good morals, and utterly opposed to spirituality, that the churches denounce the dance, and prohibit its members from participating in it. It is worldly and sensual, if not devilish, and therefore not fit to be countenanced by those who profess, in whatsoever they do, to "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

It is nearly useless to appeal to men's consciences about the whisky traffic. Those church members who are directly engaged in it must have lost all tenderness and nearly all sense of religious obligation. They must have first sold themselves before they gained their own consent to deal in this ruinous commodity. We take it for granted that the liquor dealers complained of by our correspondent, however, are only incidentally connected with the business. They may be merchants who, with other commodities, feel compelled to keep liquor, in order that they may compete with their neighbors in furnishing general supplies, and in retaining their share of the trade. They may be general wholesale dealers in provisions and supplies, and yield to what they consider a business necessity in filling orders which contain this one objectionable item. Or they may be commission merchants who furnish ties, bagging, flour and bacon, and whisky as ordered, in their relation as factors, without ever personally seeing or handling the article. The moral aspect of the subject may differ somewhat in these instances, and those who are thus nearly or remotely connected with the buying and selling might wish themselves free from the appearance of evil. Many high-minded and noble Christian men, as commission merchants, are remotely and perhaps unwillingly connected with the trade in ardent spirits. They do not use them, they would not keep them on sale, and in no direct way would they touch them. They disclaim any approval or responsibility in the premises, and simply expend the funds or credit of their patrons in any way their patrons may direct. An order for nitro-glycerine, gun-powder or arsenic would be filled in the same way, leaving the manner and responsibility of their use to those who might call for these dangerous and often abused articles. Between the commission merchant and those who keep and sell there may be a difference, and yet in morals and religion can we safely discriminate? We have had but one opinion, and that has frequently been stated in these columns. Let Christian men keep entirely clear of all appearance of evil. Better lose business, better do no business at all, than to bring themselves into condemnation. With the more direct and offensive forms of the traffic there is no occasion for argument. The wrong, the damning sin, the immeasurable, blighting curse of it, are but too evident. The very men who, from supposed necessity, have allowed themselves to be betrayed into this iniquity are at heart ashamed of it.

In reference to both of these evils, dancing and liquor dealing, it is the duty of the ministry to expose their character and tendencies, and to "reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." Many out of the church, and some who are in it, err from ignorance, and there is need of light as well as grace, especially with the young people. Sound conversion is the best cure for all. There will be no fascination in the dance to those who love God and enjoy the comforts of religion, and the man who walks with God and loves his kingdom will not deal in whisky. The trouble from these things in the church is with the unconverted members. These have come in without any genuine awakening or repentance, or they have become backsliders in heart. They have been received carelessly, with no intelligent renunciation of "the devil and all his works, and the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh;" or they have fallen from grace, and are become the victims of a hollow and deceitful profession. If we would avoid these evils in the church we must be more careful in receiving members, and more painstaking in reading and expounding the General Rules in the public congregation.

There must be the enforcement of discipline against offenders who will not mend. Members may be lost thereby. By turning out the whisky-sellers and drunkards, some who pay the largest assessments may be excluded, and it may look as though the strongest social and financial props were being swept away. Among the more fashionable and worldly, exclusion for dancing may create a temporary excitement, and many of this class may leave us for other folds, where they will be eagerly welcomed. The pastor must lay himself upon this altar of sacrifice, he must risk the finances and face the social storm, and rally the faithful few to his support. It will not do to temporize. Some of our churches have been nearly ruined by a regard to expediency. Neither the church nor the offender is benefited by a lax and compromising course. In the world there may be a fight with dancing and liquor dealing, but there should be none in the church. Those who offend in these things are not to be permitted to foment mischief, and to injure the work of God. They are to be tried and expelled. We are not prepared to believe that our churches have become so rotten and demoralized that the enforcement of discipline is no longer possible. A firm and courageous enforcement of discipline by the preachers will do far more than volumes of argument to correct the evils complained of. The Discipline as it stands is a sufficient authorization and backing. Something more explicit on dancing and liquor dealing has been called for. To this we do not object, but still we think there is law enough if we have the courage to apply and enforce it. From the pastoral address of our Bishops we take the following passages as pertinent to this subject:

An explicit utterance was given, by order of the last General Conference, in our pastoral address, on the subject of worldly amusements. We now repeat that utterance. We abate none of its teachings, with respect either to the manifest inconsistency of such indulgencies with the spirit and profession of the gospel, or the peril which they bring to the souls of men. Their multiplied and insidious forms are a source of perpetual temptation and damage, and are denounced by the word of God, and by that part of our General Rules which forbids "the taking of such diversions as cannot be taken in the name of the Lord Jesus." This denunciation is explicit and comprehensive. "The name of the Lord Jesus," in this connection, is a decisive test, and we are content to leave the issue to its sovereign arbitrament. Among those indulgencies which cannot stand this solemn test is the modern dance, both in its private and public exhibitions, as utterly opposed to the genius of Christianity, as taught by us. When persisted in it is a justifiable ground of judicial action by the church authorities.

The mild but firm administration of discipline is an integral and essential part of our economy. The purity and integrity of the body of Christ must be preserved at all hazards, so that neither heresy in doctrine nor corruptness in life be tolerated for a moment, lest they increase unto more ungodliness. There is a growing tendency, we fear, in this direction, and we take the liberty of speaking a seasonable word on this behalf. Our legislation is sufficient on this subject. It only remains that its processes be faithfully followed, according to the provisions of our Discipline, by those intrusted with its execution. A solemn responsibility rests upon the respective authorities of the church to see that its sanctity be fully maintained. But we would remark that our laws are not inexorable, and that no process should be served without taking all the preliminary measures to secure the amendment of offenders. Herein consists the safety and the force of their execution. The times imperatively demand that the moral effect of Christian discipline should vindicate itself against those loose ideas which merge disciplinary distinctions into a mere time-serving policy.

The Truth of History.

The Methodist Advocate, published in Atlanta, Georgia, devotes a column and a half to "The Action on Fraternity," in which it felicitates the Methodist Episcopal Church upon the probable happy influence of that action upon the fortunes of its "work in the South," and criticises, in its usual style, the report on fraternal greetings. There is only one part of the article, however, which claims notice in our columns. After quoting the resolutions adopted upon the departure of the delegates from the Methodist Episcopal Church, the editor says:

"Had the matter ended here, it would have met our highest ideal of the demands of the occasion. But the committee of nine entered upon a review of the past, and opened the old wounds afresh. The report details the rejection of Dr. Lovick Pierce, in 1848, in his official capacity as an agent to settle matters then in dispute between the two churches, which has been explained, regretted and accounted for on our part repeatedly, and should not have been dragged to the front again. The Church South had then commenced a suit at law against the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the official recognition of Dr. Pierce as its agent, it was supposed, would damage the case, and so while he was treated with great consideration personally and fraternally, and invited to preach in the best churches, and to a seat upon the platform, and given every attention which could be bestowed without embarrassment of the suit at law, he was not recognized as the official representative of the Church South to settle matters already in litigation. Had he come to us merely as a fraternal visitor he would have been received with cordiality and rejoicing."

Now we have no disposition unnecessarily to bring to the front the discreditable concomitants of Dr. Pierce's rejection by the Pittsburg General Conference. The committee of nine mentioned the simple fact of Dr. Pierce's rejection, in the course of a historical vindication of the attitude of the Methodist Episcopal Church South on the subject of fraternal relations, and with no purpose of "opening old wounds afresh." Had this latter purpose moved them, they would have entered into a detailed statement of the manner in which he was rejected. The treatment of Dr. Pierce by the representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Louisville was exuberant in its cordiality, and obliterated all bitterness from the memories of the incivilities of 1848. So that we would have been perfectly willing—except so far as the mere official act is necessary for historical reference—for that "by-gone" to remain a "by-gone." But when the matter is reproduced and misrepresented, as it is in the above paragraph, we feel that there is an eminent propriety in our stating the facts as they really transpired.

So far from a "seat on the platform" being offered to Dr. Pierce, and "every attention" shown him "which could be bestowed without embarrassment of the suit at law," he was not even offered a seat within the bar of the Conference. The facts are just these. The communication of Dr. Pierce, stating his mission, was referred to the committee on the state of the church. In the meantime he received not a word of notification that his note had been received, or how it had been disposed of. When the committee reported they brought in a resolution: "That we tender to the Rev. Dr. Pierce all personal courtesies, and invite him to attend our sessions," etc. Dr. Collins moved to amend by inserting instead of "to attend our sessions," "to take a seat within the bar," which amendment was "laid on the table." The next day it was resolved that by this disposition of the amendment "we did not intend to exclude Dr. Pierce, but believed the object of the amendment to be fully included in the original report." Thus Dr. Pierce was accorded the gracious privilege of attending the sessions of the General Conference—a privilege which he shared in common with every other man in Pittsburg who might care to avail himself of it. After a most ungracious rejection of a motion to invite him specially within the bar, he was notified by a resolution, to be furnished him by the secretary, that he might, if he preferred it, under cover of the first resolution, find his own way within the bar. Deliberative bodies, under like circumstances, usually appoint a committee to introduce distinguished visitors, when previously notified officially of their presence and business; but the "attention" shown Dr. Pierce on this occasion did not exceed leaving him to find his way "within the bar" as best he might. Of course self-respect forbade his making any attempt to do so. We have it from his own lips that he was about the Conference-room but twice—once with Bishop Soule in the gallery, to hear Dr. Dixon's sermon before the Conference; and at another time in the ante-room for a few moments.

So much for the statement that he "was invited to a seat upon the platform, and given every attention which could be bestowed without embarrassment of the suit at law." The assertion that he was "invited to preach in the best churches" is equally foreign from the facts in the case. Dr. Pierce was never approached, in any way whatsoever, by the Conference committee on public worship. In his report of his mission, to his own General Conference, he says:

"Perhaps I might say without impropriety that it was extremely strange for me to be at a Methodist General Conference, and virtually shut out from Methodist pulpits. Yet this was so. But for the brotherly heart and hand of a Cumberland Presbyterian, the Rev. Mr. Bryant, I might have left Pittsburg without the pleasing reflection of having preached a single sermon."

Again, the reason given by the Methodist Advocate for the rejection of Dr. Pierce is as reckless as its narrative of the attendant circumstances. It says: "The Church South had then commenced a suit at law against the Methodist Episcopal Church," etc. So far from this being true, this same General Conference provided conditionally for an arbitration of the property question, "should a suit at law be commenced"—thereafter, of course. And the suit in New York was not entered until June 19, 1849, and that in Cincinnati July 12, 1849—more than twelve months after Dr. Pierce and his mission had been rejected.

We take no pleasure in rehearsing the above facts, because we are sincerely indisposed to prolong the era of ill feeling by any reference to the past which is not demanded by fealty to principle and truth. But we cannot permit the facts of the past, however discreditable to our now fraternally disposed brethren, to be so grossly perverted without calling attention to the misrepresentation, and, as far as possible, correcting it. It would be well for the editor of the Methodist Advocate to study the journals of his own General Conference, and other documents published by his church, before venturing to make statements respecting historical facts. Nothing is stated in this article, except what is given on Dr. Pierce's personal authority, that is not to be found in official documents; and we cannot resist the conviction that the editor of the Methodist Advocate would have found them if he had been as solicitous about the accuracy of his statements as he was to veneer a very ugly transaction. It seems to us that his brother editors, who know the facts as they were, ought, for the credit of their cause, to correct him.—Southern Christian Advocate.

A Talk to the Boys.

During these days of college commencements, and floods of wise and learned advice to the boys, the following from Mr. James T. Field, as published in the Congregationalist, is worth reading:

Did it ever occur to you that you never hear out of our own country these every-day phrases so common among us—"pretty near," "about right," "near enough?" All over England the word right is always sounding in your ears, and it goes into their scholarship as well as into their railroads. You may depend upon it, we never shall truly get on in politics, in morals, in government, until we also can cry out "Right!" much oftener than we can now. Inaccuracy in everything is our rock ahead, and it is especially marked in our scholarship. Why there is not a third-rate town in Protestant Germany to-day that could not easily beat any of our largest cities in the number of accurate, thoroughly informed scholars. We are contented with smatterers. They demand thoroughness! When I hear it said of a man that he is a "pretty good scholar," I can't help thinking of a "pretty good" egg. Unless an egg is absolutely perfect, we send it away from the table. Ignorance is hateful, and simply to veneer ourselves with learning is a deadly mistake. I think it a great piece of good fortune for any one to be born in America—the greatest good luck in the world; but how we dare to be ignorant of so many things is to me unaccountable. Just see how simple the whole matter of acquiring information is. Given brains (and we always claim the privilege of knocking a man down if he disputes with us the fact of this possession,) and all we can require, and must acquire, are these three—attention, perseverance and memory. These can all be had for the asking; they can all be strengthened if they happen to be weak in any special case. You notice I do not reckon in morals, for I cannot conceive of a real student, a young man of brains or common sense, who loves learning, and means to be a first-rate by and by—I cannot conceive of his having any time or inclination for those idiotic immoralities which turn a man into a brute. Go in for fun and genuine enjoyment. It is a capital rule to play a little every day of our lives. Heaven knows our faces are long enough, naturally, in such a climate as this; but we have only just so many years for real study, and youth won't stretch much beyond the twenties in a country so full of wear and tear as the one we are born into.

I plead with you, then, for accuracy. Be sure of everything you know. A half-baked scholar is merely an underdone goose. He is simply a quack in every sense. Don't go about this world of ours, that sorely needs completeness in character, like so many locks without keys, or keys with missing locks.

Don't be afraid of "lions in the way." Nine times out of ten the reported lions do not exist at all; or if they do, and can't be slain, go round them, and thus avoid danger. The difficulty is that many of us are too indolent to keep out of harm's way. I am immensely fond of that plucky reply of a man to an indolent, timid friend. "Suppose," said the person who was always borrowing trouble, "suppose, now, somebody should tell you that you were going to die next Tuesday in a certain street in Boston. What would you do?" "Do!" said the other, "why I wouldn't be there!"

All our dictionaries contain at least one very foolish word. When Mirabeau's secretary once said to him: "Sir, what you require is impossible." "Impossible," cried Mirabeau, starting from his chair, "never name to me again that blockhead of a word!" Now downright accurate scholarship is impossible nowhere, and here in America we must come to it very soon. We have already delayed it too long. It will not do to shirk it any longer. When you hear a student reply to a question in mathematics or Greek or history, "I know the answer very well, but I can't find words to express it," don't you believe him! He does not know the answer. He may think he does, but the poor chap is mistaken in his knowledge; if he knew definitely—and this is the only way to know anything—the words would somehow twist themselves out of his mouth, though they mained his reluctant jaws for life.

It is a great thing to start right. If we begin wrong, the chances are we shall never arrive at the point proposed. We shall go on and on in the wrong direction that leads nowhither. We have a story of a traveler who, wishing to reach Taunton, in the State of Massachusetts, and somehow got turned round and was trotting along very composedly in the opposite direction from the right one to that town. Meeting a farmer in the road, he drew up and asked: "How far is it to Taunton, if I keep straight on?" "Well," said the farmer, with a twinkle in his intelligent eye, "if ye keep straight on the way ye're going now, its about twenty-five thousand miles; but if ye turn right round and go t'other way, its about half a mile."

Bishops' Salaries and Assessments.

The following report on this subject was adopted by the General Conference at Louisville, May 21, 1874:

REPORT NO. VI OF THE COMMITTEE ON EPISCOPACY.

The salaries of the Bishops are fixed at $3,000 each, and traveling expenses. To pay these claims the following assessments have been made:

Adopted Tuesday morning, May 21.
L. M. LEE, Chairman.

THE Pittsburg Christian Advocate, noticing the action of our General Conference on the subject of fraternity with the Methodist Episcopal Church, says:

We would have been better pleased if our Southern brethren had seen fit to content themselves with something like that which was presented in the substitute or the minority report. But we do not know that we have sufficient ground for quarreling with them for restating the old points of controversy, as the matter seems to them important, especially as they have done so in perfectly respectful and courteous language. It is hardly worth while, we think, at this time to argue these matters over again. They have appointed fraternal delegates to our next General Conference, and have also taken measures for the appointment of commissioners to meet any that may be appointed by our body, for the purpose of adjusting, if possible, the matters of difference and dispute between us. We doubt not such a commission will be appointed or authorized by our General Conference. We would think it wise, therefore, to let discussion sleep for the nonce in the expectation of having a satisfactory settlement in the near future.

THE degree of doctor of divinity was worthily conferred upon Rev. N. H. D. Wilson at the recent commencement of Trinity College.

Dean Stanley and the Church.

If the Archbishop of Canterbury did not assist at the dedication of the City Temple, Dr. Parker's new church in London, says the New York Observer, it seems to have been a great occasion, nevertheless. And it was signalized by the attendance of the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs who came "in State," and the Rev. Dr. Alexander, of Edinburg, preached the sermon.

After the service was concluded a banquet was spread at the Cannon Street Hotel, at which speeches were made, notably by Rev. Dr. Stanley, the Dean of Westminster. As he holds a high position in the Church of England, his remarks on the relations of the various denominations to each other are full of interest, as indicating the tendency of thought in the church on the other side of the sea.

The Dean said, when he heard some of the speeches which had preceded his, and when he was told of the splendid gift of the corporation of London and of others to the new building, he could not help feeling that the time had almost approached when the consummation of a wish entertained by many eminent statesmen, and, he confessed, near his own heart, would be realized, for something very like "concurrent endowment" had indeed been witnessed on that occasion; but when he knew that the Lord Mayor had graced with his presence the inauguration service, he began even to think the probability of "concurrent establishment." Not venturing further into those thorny speculations he would, however, claim for himself a hearty wish and prayer for the concurrent existence of all good Christian communities. That surely was an innocent wish and desire, which might be lawfully entertained by any minister, whether Conformist or Nonconformist. When, as in his case, for instance, a clergyman of the Church of England regarded its past history and that of England, he could surely feel no scruple in taking a pride, a just Christian pride, in the good works and deeds of those Nonconformists who had departed from us. What English churchman was there who was not proud of being a fellow-countryman of Owen, Howe, Baxter, Bunyan and Wesley? And he would also venture to ask what Nonconformist, as an Englishman, was not glad to belong to that country which had produced such men as Hooker, Chillingworth, Lord Falkland, the great latitudinarians of Cambridge, the great philosophers of Oxford, Bishop Butler, Thomas Arnold, and others whom he could name? Entertaining these feelings as they did, toward the dead, what on earth and in heaven prevented them entertaining similar feelings toward the living? Why should not he be proud of those Nonconformists who, by their peculiar gifts and education, were enabled to address classes of their countrymen whom he and his fellow-churchmen, by their gifts and their education, were unable to equally address, penetrate and reach? On the other hand, what Nonconformist was not equally willing to admit that there were other classes of Englishmen to whom churchmen were able to address themselves, not with more facility or greater hope of being heard, but perhaps with greater ability and more opportunities of being heard? As long as different wants and different classes existed in this country, so long would there be room for the concurrent existence and activity of both the church and the Nonconformist body.

There was still a further advantage from concurrent activity. The Nonconformists were of great service to churchmen by stimulating them in their work, by making experiments upon which they themselves were unable to embark, and by preventing them, by their friendly and generous rivalry, from falling into sluggish apathy. No desire was nearer his heart than the closer and more perfect union of Christendom, but he doubted whether the best plan of union was that which contemplated the organic absorption of the different churches one into another. On the contrary, could not that union be achieved by the united though divergent efforts of the different churches in all their branches and spheres of activity from one end of the country to the other? All institutions were mortal, not only "the cloud-capped towers and the gorgeous palaces" to which the Lord Mayor had alluded, but the monarchy, the houses of Parliament, the corporation of London, the Church of England, and even the congregational union itself. If the day should unhappily arise when any of the great religious communions should become extinct, he would be a churchman unworthy of the name who would not feel a deep pang of regret at the thought that any great independent communion, which had nurtured so many sons in the past, had ceased from the face of the earth. He hoped also that if ever the day should come when the national Church of England ceased to exist, there would be no true Nonconformist who, from the bottom of his soul, would not feel and express his deep regret that that venerable institution, which had done more than any other body or bodies in this land to keep together the religious and national feelings of the great British empire, should no more be heard or thought of among the churches or institutions of our time.

It is added that "the Dean's speech was most warmly applauded." Dr. Parker, following, expressed great hope that before long the Dean would preach in the City Temple.

THE commencement of Readville Seminary, Baton Rouge, takes place on Thursday, June 25. We wish we could be there to see and hear. We doubt not the young ladies will acquit themselves well, and that the exercises will afford a delightful and instructive entertainment to the large assembly which usually greets this annual occasion.

NOTHING is tronblesome that we do willingly.

Sketches.

The following sketches, taken from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, are by the facile pen of an old friend of ours, who is now on the editorial staff of that paper:

No one would think the senior Bishop, Robert Paine, D. D., was seventy-five years old, and yet effective. The Bishop has much of the grave bearing of the lamented Hamline, and the sunny countenance of Bishop Janes. Those who knew that sweet singer-preacher, James G. Sunsom, some years before he died, would see some resemblance in the Bishop. He is a North Carolinian, born in 1799; entered the ministry in his nineteenth year; spent seventeen years at the head of LaGrange College, in Alabama, and eleven years in pastoral work. In 1846 he was elected Bishop. It will be remembered he was a member of the General Conference of 1844, when the Southern members took offense at the action against Bishop Andrew. He was chairman of the committee of nine, whose report forms an important chapter in Methodist history. The Bishop presides with much dignity, and is prompt and firm in his decisions. He is always present and attentive to the work in hand at each session.

The death of Bishops Capers, Bascom and Early makes Bishop George Foster Pierce, son of Dr. Lovick Pierce, next in the order of seniority. Years before he was elevated to the episcopate we heard him preach with wonderful power in old Liberty Street church, Pittsburg. The memory of that occasion still lingers in our mind. The Bishop is scholarly, refined and dignified. His great integrity, high-minded manner and fine judgment have given him much weight in the councils of the church. For twenty years he has adorned his high office. He has entered his sixty-fourth year, and has been in the ministry, since his twentieth year. At the time he was elected Bishop he was president of Emory College.

Bishop Richard Hubbard Kavanaugh is a Kentuckian by birth, and is now over seventy-two years of age. He entered the ministry in his twenty-first year, and has always been a great worker and successful minister. He was elected Bishop in 1854. The Bishop resides in Louisville, and is greatly beloved. He betrays little evidence of his age either in his movements or his appearance. He looks as if he would not become superannuate for a score of years to come.

Bishop William May Wightman is a native of Charleston, South Carolina, and resides there now. He has turned sixty-six, and yet wears a youthful look, judging from his coal-black hair, slightly fringed with silver threads. No wonder he should captivate a lovely wife, who is yet in middle life. He was elected Bishop in 1866. The Bishop entered the ministry in his twentieth year, and spent a considerable portion of his life in educational and editorial work. He is a fine scholar, very dignified in his carriage, and presides with much grace.

Bishop Enoch M. Marvin is a Missourian, nearly fifty-one years old. In his nineteenth year he became a traveling preacher. He is tall, slender, dark-skinned, don't use a razor, with black, bright eyes. While his appearance does not indicate rugged health, he is a great worker—works every department well. There is a magnetic feeling about the Bishop as a speaker which is felt by all coming within the range of his voice. Just the man to be stationed at the gateway of the far West. He makes Southern Methodism feel the weight of his influence where he resides, at St. Louis, and the region round about. We believe he was always in the pastoral work until he was elected to the episcopate eight years ago.

Bishop David Seth Doggett was born in Virginia, and is sixty-four years old. He, too, entered the ministry in his nineteenth year. Part of his ministerial life was spent as a professor in Randolph-Macon College. He spent one term as editor of the Quarterly Review, from 1850 to 1854. In 1866 he was elected Bishop. He seems to be too refined in looks for an active worker. In the chair he is less striking as a presiding officer than his associates; takes things comfortably; and one is led to wonder at his election to the office, except it be on the score of what he had done before his election, rather than on what was expected hereafter from him in that high position. He resides in Richmond, Virginia.

Bishop Holland Nimmons McTyeire is a fine specimen of a South Carolinian. He is just now what he always was—born to lead and be a leader worthy of followers. We have known him for nearly a score of years, and have been frequently in his society, when he resided in New Orleans, as editor of the NEW ORLEANS ADVOCATE. He is nearly half a century old, and has been Bishop eight years. He entered the ministry in 1845, and very soon took rank as a preacher, and, though quite a young man, was placed in charge of the paper named. The Bishop is a man of decided opinions, stern, and seemingly harsh at times, but his generous, frank nature soon disarms the stranger of that feeling. He is courtly-looking in all his ways, bright eyes, dark-skinned, tall and well built, without being stout. As a presiding officer he is every whit a Bishop, after the Joshua Soule pattern. His manner of exercising authority is Czar-like, and yet in such a natural, easy manner that he commands great respect. His connection with the great Vanderbilt University project, and the rare diplomatic talents he has displayed in its inception and management, will entitle him to a bright page in history. He deserves the honor and perquisites that have been assigned him by the "Commodore" as president of the board of trustees, giving him a home and a salary.

Bishop John Christian Keener, the youngest in the order of election, being four years in the episcopate, is a Baltimorean by birth, and a graduate of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut at the time the sainted Wilbur Fisk was president. He is a son of Christian Keener, of precious memory, of Baltimore. He commenced to travel in the Alabama Conference in 1843, and after some years he was assigned to New Orleans, where he labored efficiently as pastor, presiding elder and editor of the NEW ORLEANS ADVOCATE, when he was elected to the episcopate in 1870. When we knew him, fifteen to eighteen years ago, he was very spare and rather delicate, standing over six feet, but of late years his large frame is well enshrined with flesh. He possesses fine preaching talents, and something of that magnetic power of our beloved Simpson. We have heard him with delight preach to white and colored congregations. His vivid pictures and glowing style always wonderfully roused the colored people, when we have heard him address thousands in one congregation. The Bishop is in his fifty-eighth year, and resides in New Orleans.

The most noticeable character seated among the College of Bishops, the only member of the body so honored, is Lovick Pierce, the veteran of ninety years, sixty-nine of which have been spent in the ministry. The chief feature of old age visible is his shrunken features, the result of his late spell of sickness. Otherwise he gives little evidence of his great age. His mind appears clear, movements quick, and he seems to be deeply interested in the doings of the Conference. We had not seen the venerable man since his visit to Pittsburg, during the General Conference held in Liberty Street church in 1848, until last Sunday morning we heard him preach in Trinity church, in charge of Rev. Dr. Stevenson, of our body, a sermon of much interest. His voice was feeble, but the matter and manner showed that his "right hand had not lost its cunning." The circumstance of his preaching for the first time in one of our churches, and the occasion itself, was remarkable.

Dr. T. O. Summers, the secretary, sits at the left of the presiding Bishop. He is a man of note among Southern Methodists, and his scholarly abilities are recognized throughout the length and breadth of Methodism. As the editor of the great official, the Christian Advocate, Nashville, book editor, commentator and author, educator and pulpit speaker, he has filled the large expectations of the church. He has been greatly honored by Southern Methodists, and deservedly. The doctor is a great worker, and, though up in years, he is still active and vigorous. He seems to have lived well, from his excellent physique. It is said he may not wish to be returned as editor of the Christian Advocate, as the new duties of one of the chief professorships of Vanderbilt University will occupy his time too much to perform editorial work. The matter is in the doctor's hand, such is his great popularity. (Since elected:) He would make a capital Bishop. His assistants are young and rising men. Dr. F. M. Kennedy, editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, is as able as popular, and like his associate, Dr. Haygood, possesses a fine voice, full and round. These brethren do much of the reading of the secretarial work, while Dr. Summers keeps the business in hand without a flaw or halt.

Sunday School Superintendents.

The New York Christian Advocate, after devoting considerable space to the discussion and final action on this subject by our recent General Conference, says:

This matter is one of great interest in our own church work, and the evils of the "Sunday school society" system have no doubt been much more severely felt among us than with our Southern brethren; and yet while we are suffering under its infliction they throw it off at a bound. Under the "union" movement, which originated the modern Sunday school nearly half a century ago, they were only remotely connected with the church—often not at all—and, as voluntary associations, they of course chose their own officers and made their own regulations. And now since they have become church institutions they still retain some of their original features, to the marring of their harmonious connection with the system. An attempt is made in our Discipline to remedy this defect by requiring that the election of superintendents—by the teachers—shall be subject to the confirmation or rejection of the Quarterly Conference.

But probably in nine cases out of ten no action at all is taken, or, at most, only a matter-of-course acquiescence is given. And so it happens that the office which, in its religious responsibilities, stands second only to that of the pastor, is taken wholly away from the minister, and practically almost entirely from the church authorities, and given up to the disposal of irresponsible persons, often young and inexperienced, and who may not be even members of the church. No doubt the minister has a right to interfere in such a case, and, by virtue of his authority as the spiritual head of the church, to take the Sunday school under his own direction. But it would be better to have his authority properly recognized and defined in the Discipline. The plan adopted by the Southern Church is perhaps the best practicable. May we not hope that our General Conference will copy it? And till then let the Sunday schools be held closely in hand by the Quarterly Conferences, and let all pastors avail themselves of this agency in their care for the lambs of their flocks.

MY HEAVEN is to please God and glorify him; to give all to him; to be wholly devoted to his glory; that is the heaven I long for; that is my religion, and that is my happiness.—Brainerd.

I WOULD not give one moment of heaven for all the joy and riches of the world, even if it lasted for thousands and thousands of years.—Luther.

Seashore Camp Ground.

The next camp meeting on the Seashore camp ground, two miles west of Biloxi, Mississippi, will commence on Friday, the twenty-fourth of July.

The trustees call attention to the following rules:

All persons having selected lots for the purpose of building tents are required to report to the trustees, one month prior to the date of the commencement of the camp meeting, whether they intend to occupy the lot; failing so to give notice, the lot will be forfeited and appropriated to other parties.

All tents erected are required to be of value not less than $40, and shall be completed at least one week before the commencement of the camp meeting.

The Rev. William M. Jordan is appointed surveyor of the camp ground, and allowed $1.50 each for fixing the lines of the lots, to be paid by the lot-holder; and to supervise the location of each tent, with reference to the preservation of the shade-trees.

Pleasantly situated lots are furnished free to persons desiring to erect permanent tents thereon.

A limited number of small tents unfurnished, and cots, with sheet and pillow, will be for rent at reasonable prices; and public boarding and lodging, to a limited extent, will be provided at a reasonable charge.

All persons attending the camp meeting are advised to arrange for their comfort by the erection of their own private tent, or making other suitable arrangements beforehand, and to this end are requested to correspond with the trustees: Dr. J. J. Lyons, J. H. Keller, B. O. L. Rayne, New Orleans, Louisiana; William Otis, John Ellsworth, Mobile, Alabama; H. C. Vaughn, Moss Point, Mississippi; G. W. W. Goodwyn, treasurer, Philip Hallaran, secretary, W. H. Foster, president, New Orleans, Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, May 5, 1871.

THE title of the missionary paper, to be issued monthly, beginning with July, is Our Missionary, and not The Missionary, as announced in the prospectus last week. The publication of a paper devoted exclusively to missionary affairs is a step forward, and the enterprise should meet with a hearty support. Drs. McFerrin and Haygood will, we doubt not, make Our Missionary an interesting sheet. Every member of our church should take it.

TRINITY COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT, NORTH CAROLINA.—We learn from Rev. Ira T. Wyche, says the Raleigh Christian Advocate, the following facts in regard to the commencement exercises of Trinity College. Bishop Keener's sermon was strong, sensible and spiritual—very appropriate to the times and the occasion, well calculated to impress and improve all who heard it, especially the young men.

The address of Rev. Dr. Wilson was strictly a literary address, opening up a broad and beautiful field of thought and truth, showing in its range and reach a mind familiar with the facts and figures in its wide domain, where he had often roamed and gathered its flowers and its fruits.

The juniors acquitted themselves to the admiration of all. The crowd was very large on commencement day. Intelligence, grace and beauty gathered to enjoy the rich treat prepared by the graduating class. The young gentlemen all acquitted themselves well, and showed that they had been well instructed in thought, language, utterance and gesture. Some of them were especially fine. There were thirteen graduates. The medals were presented by Major Armfield, and the Bibles by Bishop Keener. The degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon Rev. N. H. D. Wilson, of Greensboro.

HE LIVES long that lives well; and time misspent is not lived, but lost.—Fuller.

E. E. F. ROSS, ESQ., connected for several years with the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, left on the evening of June 17 to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

WE CLIP from the Weekly Clarion, published at Jackson, Mississippi, the following tribute to our enterprising neighbors, Mr. William Gregg and his energetic wife, Mrs. Ada Gregg, whose purchasing agency is advertised in the columns of the ADVOCATE:

"Gregg's Purchasing Agency.—We call attention to the card of Mr. and Mrs. Gregg, of New Orleans, who have established a purchasing bureau at No. 189 Canal street. Visitors at the last Mississippi State Fair will recollect Mr. and Mrs. Gregg as in charge of the Wilson sewing machine department. They are peculiarly well qualified for the business they have recently established. Our lady readers will find in Mrs. Gregg a lady of accommodating disposition and cultivated taste, who will respond fully and promptly to all inquiries that may be addressed to her. This agency must prove a great convenience to many who wish to purchase articles in the Crescent City, but who have neither the time nor ability to go there in person."

WE DIRECT the attention of persons visiting the West to the advertisement of the Crawford House, Cincinnati, Ohio, under the proprietorship of Mr. Frank J. Oakes.

WE HAVE had for several months in constant use the Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, and it has given such satisfaction to the guests of our house that our orders for it have been larger than for all other kinds of sauce combined.

THE GREATEST

MEDICAL

DISCOVERY

OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,

FROM

The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Twenty-three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all; and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Raw and Inflamed,

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and piling away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly, ap11 1y DONALD KENNEDY.

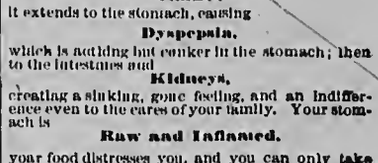
Price, $1.50 per bottle. For sale by all druggists.



THE BEST ADVICE THAT CAN BE given to persons suffering from

DYSPEPSIA, BILIOUS COMPLAINTS

CONSTIPATION, COLIC, SICK HEADACHE,

Fever and Ague, Nervous Debility,

or of any disorder of the Stomach, Liver or Kidneys, is to tone, cleanse and regulate them by the use of

Dr. Tutt's Vegetable Liver Pills.

They act very mildly, yet thoroughly restore the functional action of the Digestive Organs and the Intestines, and renovate the whole system, imparting a good appetite and healthy assimilation of food. They produce neither Nausea, Griping nor Debility, and may be taken at any time, without change of diet or occupation.

Price, 25 cents a box. Sold by all druggists.

Dr. Tutt's Hair Dye

possesses qualities that no other dye does. Its effect is instantaneous, and is so natural that it cannot be detected by the closest observer. Being harmless and easily applied, it is in general use among the fashionable Hair-Dressers in every large city in the United States. Price, $1 a box Sold everywhere.

DILLY-DALLY.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

I don't believe you ever
Knew any one as silly
As the girl I'm going to tell about,
A little girl named Lilly,
Dilly-dally Lilly!

Oh! she is very slow;
She drags her feet
Along the street,
And dilly-dallies so!

She's always late for breakfast,
Without a bit of reason;
For Bridget rings and rings the bell,
And wakes her up in season,
Dilly-dally Lilly!

How can you be so slow?
Why don't you try
To be more airy,
And not dilly-dally so?

'Tis just the same at evening;
And it's really quite distressing
To see the time that Lilly wastes
In dressing and undressing,
Dilly-dally Lilly!

It's very wrong, you know,
To do no work
That you can shirk,
And dilly-dally so. Nursery.

Doing and Being.

"There!" exclaimed Marion fretfully, as she turned from the window, "the day is all gone, and I haven't done anything. I haven't done anything," she repeated discontentedly, "and I meant to do so much."

"What have you done?" inquired Elizabeth, closing her work-basket. "Sit down and tell me."

"Well," assented Marion, seating herself, "you know my days as well as I do. This morning I read three chapters in the Bible, as usual. I do want to get through it this year. Then I was gone an hour on that errand for father; then I wrote three letters, mended Tom's mittens, and corrected Nellie's composition; then mother called me to set the dinner-table. After dinner I directed a magazine and two papers to your missionary; then—oh! Nellie's arithmetic—that took me an hour, she was so stupid; then father asked me to copy a deed for him, and then that tiresome Mrs. Green called, and I entertained her for an hour; and then—how little it all seems!—I went out to get sewing-silk for mother, and buy that ball I've been promising Georgie for a month; and now the man is lighting the gas over the way, and my day is gone! I can't help feeling dissatisfied; I haven't done anything good to-day."

Elizabeth was rocking lazily to and fro in her chair. "You think a great deal about doing, don't you?"

"Yes, and so do you! You are always at work doing something."

"It's a good thing to be so. God gives us many things to do; but don't you think he gives us something to be, just as well?"

"Oh, yes!" very quickly. "Of course."

"May I speak plainly, Marion? May I tell you all about your unsatisfying day?"

"You dear old Elizabeth!" Marion sprang up and threw both her arms around her neck. "You ought to have been born my grandmother. 'Faithful are the wounds of a friend.' Shoot me through and through; I will not even groan." Nevertheless, Marion's lips trembled as she dropped down on the carpet at her friend's feet, and laid her head in her lap.

Before speaking Elizabeth bent over to kiss her. "I've been thinking all day, as I have watched you, dear, that I would like to say this to you. I see that in trying to do what he commands you forget to be what he commands. I know all about it. First, about reading the three chapters every day. How did you read them?"

"Hurried through the last," confessed Marion; "and I did look to see if it was short. I feel condemned if I don't read it through when I set myself to do it."

"You poor child! We will talk about that some other time. Then came the errand for your father; you fretted about that, because you said you were wasting your time. You answered your mother saucily when she inquired whom your letters were written to; you scolded Tom for burning his mittens; you made fun of Nellie's spelling, and set her lips to quivering; you spoke impatiently to your mother about setting the dinner-table."

"And Betsey ought to do it, I repeat it," interrupted the girl willfully.

"And you slapped Georgie for hiding the paper you were looking for."

"I am sorry for that," said a voice from under Marion's flowing curls.

"You scolded Nellie for being stupid until she cried; you frowned over the paper you copied for your father; and did you not make fun of Mrs. Green before she had reached the corner?"

"Oh, dear! tell me about being." Marion looked up with penitent eyes. "I will think about doing, if you will help me."

"God says: 'Be kindly affectioned one to another.'

"'Be ye also patient.'

"'Be ye thankful.'

"'Be not conformed to this world.'

"'Become little children.'

"'Be ye therefore perfect.'

"'Be courteous.'

"'Be not wise in your own conceits.'

"'Be not overcome of evil.'"

Marion listened, making no reply. Twilight grew into darkness. The tea-bell sounded, bringing Marion to her feet. In the firelight Elizabeth could see that her cheeks were wet.

"I'll have a better day to-morrow, God helping me. I see that doing grows out of being."

"We cannot do what God loves without doing all that he commands. It is easier to do with a rush than to be patient or kind or forgiving or gentle or unselfish or humble or just or watchful."

"I should think it was," returned Marion emphatically.

"I CAN PLOD."—When Dr. Carey, the great pioneer of mission work in India, first proposed his plans to his father he said: "William, are you mad?" His discouragements in first entering upon his work were very great. What was the secret that enabled the shoemaker's apprentice to become one of the most distinguished men of his age? What brilliant gift raised him from an obscure position to one of honor and fame, as the author of grammars and dictionaries, translations of the Bible and other books? He either translated or assisted in the completion of twenty-seven versions of Scripture, requiring a knowledge of as many languages or dialects. He tells us the secret. In giving an estimate of his own character he speaks of himself with Christian humility, but with full consciousness of the honor put upon him in the wonderful results he had been permitted to achieve. He says: "I can plod—I can persevere." He does not say, as we hear too often nowadays: "I can manage to get along, and keep up with my class in some way, without much study. I can jump at the meaning of my lessons, or I can catch up a trade without years of hard labor;" but, "I can persevere!" Plodding boys, hold up your heads! You may seem to be left behind in the race by smart companions, but plod on; "the race is not" always "to the swift nor the battle to the strong."

Daffy-Down-Dilly.

BY EMILY A. BRADDOCK.

"Wake up!" "Wake up!" Everybody said: "How hard the March Wind is blowing;" but nobody knew that he was talking. Only the flowers, and they understood what he said, and knew that he was talking to them too.

"Wake up!" "Wake up!" "Come up!" "Come up!" The call was louder now, and a blue bird that happened to be passing joined in. Away down under the snow there was a great commotion—an opening of bright eyes, a stretching out of little arms, a shaking of silky ringlets, and such a chatter! The voice had broken the naps of all the flowers snugly tucked away in their little beds in all sorts of pretty nooks, and they were all starting up and talking together.

"What a shame to call us so early!" "Too bad!" exclaimed one and another.

"For my part, I'm not half rested," yawned sleepy Go-to-Bed-Noon.

"I wouldn't dare go through the snow," whispered timid Violet.

"I," said Wind-Flower, "shan't think of going yet; the winds are too rough."

"My complexion would be ruined," announced Tulip impressively; "the cold always makes me pale."

All sorts of excuses were given. In the midst of the confusion out stepped Daffy, with her yellow dress on, almost ready to go.

"Why, Daffy-Down-Dilly!" called a chorus of voices. "Surely you're not going yet?"

"Yes; one should go up when called to it. I must meet the Spring. How sad she would be to find not a flower to welcome her!" And Daffy quietly went on with her preparations.

"Poor child! you'll surely freeze," said good-natured Mrs. Heart's-Ease.

"What will people say?" lisped Miss Verbena, pursing up her dainty lips.

"Might think you were out of your sphere, dear—call you strong-minded," drawled Mr. Hyacinth, peeping out of his dressing-room just then, with his ringlets only half curled. "Better wait till I lead the way, and follow me."

Daffy, laughing, held up her pretty green lances of leaves. "Thank you, I can make my way alone." Then, throwing on her silver hood, she tripped away, and all the flowers began to doze again. Only Mr. Hyacinth kept at his toilet, puzzling his wits over the problem whether a pink or blue neck-tie would best suit his style.

Going up is hard work. Daffy found it so. If the lances hadn't been sharp they never could have pierced the hard soil. But Daffy kept pushing them bravely, climbing, climbing, slowly but surely, up the path they opened.

It was dark, but then she was all the time getting nearer to the light. By and by she came to a great snow-drift. Ugh! how cold it was. But Daffy knew she must not mind a cold shoulder turned toward her. Just one more push and there stood brave little Daffy, up in the sunshine, peeping out of her silver hood and smiling on the world.

"Bravo!" roared March Wind, so loud that she trembled a little.

"Welcome!" sang a blue bird, and "Welcome!" piped a robin still louder.

"O you darling!" shouted some chubby-cheeked children, rushing out of a cottage near by and clapping their hands, "we have waited so long for a flower."

"Bless you, dear heart! Bless you for coming before I go!" It was an old man that said this, bending over her on his staff.

How happy all these things made Daffy! She ventured to throw her silver hood farther back, and every day grew prettier and brighter. What cared she, though she was cold and rather lonesome, if only she could do a little good in the world? She did a great deal more than she knew of. The birds took heart and went to their house-building. Everybody felt encouraged to go about their duties.

All for one 'bright, brave little body!

But the best of all was when Spring, the lovely queen whom the flowers can see, though we cannot, thinking she is just sunshine and dew and bloom, instead of a real being, whispered this secret to her: She was to be her favorite henceforth, and nearest her throne, for her loving courage!

The other flowers came up after awhile, when everything was nice and comfortable. They were all beautifully dressed. Mr. Hyacinth, indeed, looked all neck-tie, having decided upon double bows of royal purple as the fitting solution of his problem. But not one of them all received such a welcome as Daffy. Not one did as much good as she.

TESTAMENTARY charities are no better than dead sacrifices.—Shertock.

Farm, Garden and Household.

Philosophy of Churning.

Mr. L. B. Arnold, of Rochester, New York, read a paper on the above topic. He described the structure of milk and its proper condition for the churn. Cream consists of globules of fat inclosed in a pellicle of albuminous matter. They float in the milk. There are several varieties of these oils, and all the herbage that cows eat contains some essential oil. It is these that give the nutty flavor to butter and cheese. When the cows eat peppermint or onions the smell is distinctly imparted to the milk. He thought that animal odor was a volatile oil, and one which affects butter-making. The main bulk of butter consists of olein and margarin, the former yellow and the latter white. The fat globules are small in the milk of cows thin in flesh, and they are larger when she is fat. The size of the globules varies in different breeds. There is at least one, and perhaps two, envelopes of every globule. The business of churning is to get off this sack, and there are two ways to do it—one to work it off by friction, as with a crank churn, and the other by pressure, as in a dash churn. The fat globules are of different sizes, and the sacks of the larger ones wear off first. The smaller lie between the larger, and are often unbroken by friction. These sacks have a cheesy nature, and by souring the cream they shrink and break off, but souring should not be carried too far, since, if alcohol is formed, the fat will be eaten.

He preferred the old-fashioned dash churn, the dash cross-shaped, and the crosses nearly filling the circle of the churn, except at the corners of the cross. This form of dashes gives most pressure with least friction, and hence the best result is obtained. It reaches all the globules, breaks off the pellicle or sack without breaking the grain of the fat, which escapes in elongated form up through the corners of the cross-shaped dash. The barred churn, with cross sections, he regarded as next best to the dash.

The temperature of the cream is important; when slightly acid, from fifty-five to sixty-two degrees is best. Sweet cream will bear a higher temperature, and whole milk still higher. The quality of milk and cream is injured by sudden changes of temperature. A steady temperature is better maintained by the use of water. Overchurning should be avoided, as it makes the butter salvy. He preferred washing out the buttermilk with water rather than working it out. Cream and milk should not be covered; the animal odor should be allowed to pass off, or it will injuriously affect the butter.

In answer to questions from Dr. Hoskins he said that, as margarin is harder than olein, light-colored butter is harder than yellow butter. If the color of butter is altered by the action of light, its keeping qualities will be affected injuriously. In reply to the question why it takes longer to churn in July and August than at other seasons, he said there were several causes, one being that the globules are not possessed of so strong pellicles, unless the cows are kept very cool, and the butter becomes salvy in consequence. Another cause is that milk is not so well cared for then as it should be.—Vermont Dairymen's Convention.

Too Fat.

Who ever saw young stock too fat? In a good agricultural paper a writer cautions an inquirer about "getting young animals too fat!" Now to commence with the noble horse. Who among the thousands reading of too much fat ever saw a colt, having proper liberty for exercise, too fat? And supposing a naturally good constitution, combined with his owner's good care and liberal feeding, cause a round, mole-like appearance, how will the flesh and fat injure the colt? Will his sleek, plump, happy-looking frame make the legs ache to carry it about? Did any one ever see a colt that nature did not provide muscle and bone enough to grow with the body unless some booby shut up the animal and prevented daily development? Nature, if not interfered with, remedies everything of the sort; and even in confining very young stock the appetite will generally fail, so that instead of too much fat a loss of flesh, strength and life will follow. A young colt too fat indeed!

What next? Where is the man who owns calves too fat? Who possesses lambs or pigs too fat? Will the objectionable fat prevent the wool from growing, or does it injure anything young of any variety whatever which has natural liberty?

It is a miserably poor heart that cannot feel pleasure at the sight of happiness; and what is so suggestive of enjoyment of life as fat? Too much of it forsooth! Why breeders use all their powers of production in giving a natural aptitude to fatten; but in cattle of the bovine race working oxen may be too fat, but nature provides the remedy; and with horses, however fat they become when at rest, the means of reducing the fat without injury to the sinews and constitution are understood by every good horseman.

Once in awhile a monstrosity of fat will be found, the human race not being exempt; but this has naught to do with the subject of being "too fat" in a general way.

Meat may be too fat, but the lean of very fat meat is nicer than that from an animal with little upon it; and the fattest animals, if not carried to excess, always command the best price, and at Christmas the extra prize-fed cattle sell high too. However, it is intended to conclude this piece without reference to anything beyond the folly of talking or writing about young stock being "too fat."

Should any of these fine old gentlemen who write, "It is a rule of theirs to guard against having young stock too fat," happen to see these remarks on their opinion, etc., it would be satisfactory to have proof of the correctness of their theory; for instance, they might point out some horses which were injured for life by being too fat when colts; they might also give instances of breeders of several different breeds of cattle who have ruined their herds by having their calves and yearlings too fat; and perhaps they may adduce numerous cases of American agriculturists having permanently injured their flocks of sheep by keeping their lambs and tegs too fat; and, if this is satisfactorily explained, it will show how it is there is no sheep husbandry except-ing isolated cases. What a pity farmers should be prone to make their young stock too fat!—A Working Farmer, in Rural New Yorker.

TREATMENT OF A BAD HORSE.—The New York Commercial Advertiser says: "A beautiful and high-spirited horse would never allow a shoe to be put on his feet or any persons to handle his feet. In an attempt to shoe him recently he resisted every effort, kicked aside everything but an anvil, and nearly killed himself on that, and finally was brought back to his stable unshod. This defect was just on the eve of consigning him to the plow, where he might work barefoot, when an officer in our service, lately returned from Mexico, took a cord about the size of a common bed-cord, put it in the mouth of the horse like a bit, tied it tightly on the animal's head, passing his left ear under the string, not painfully tight, but tight enough to keep the ear down and the cord in its place. This done, he patted the horse gently on the side of the head and commanded him to follow, and instantly the horse obeyed, perfectly subdued, and as gentle and obedient as a well-trained dog, suffered his feet to be handled with impunity, and acted in all respects like an old stager. The gentleman who thus furnished this exceedingly simple means of subduing a very dangerous propensity intimated that it is practiced in Mexico and South America in the management of wild horses."

THIS is the way in which café-au-lait is made in France in families of moderate means: "It is made fresh every morning in the common French coffee-pot. The upper movable part has a finely perforated strainer at the bottom, into which the ground coffee (too often mixed with a little chicory) is put. A coarse movable strainer is then put at the top of the coffee, and boiling water is poured through the top part. Two or three of the first cups which come off are passed through the strainer once or twice. The French always keep the coffee-pot warm during the operation by keeping it close to the fire or on the hob. Plain water is not used, but the grounds of the coffee used the day before are boiled up again; the water is strained off, and then used for the coffee of the day. The coffee and boiling milk are served separately. Two-thirds milk and one-third coffee form about the proportion. The milk should always be put into the cup first, so that as little of the aroma as possible escapes. The latter rule ought to be applied to tea or to wine when diluted, in which cases the milk or the water should always be put in before the aromatic liquid is added.

ALCOHOL AS A REMEDY FOR BURNS.—Alcohol, recommended by Sydenham, has lately been employed by Levisour, particularly with children, as the most rapid and effective means of alleviating the pain of burns. The affected part is either simply covered loosely with an alcoholic compress or is bathed with alcohol, when the pain instantly disappears, but returns when the application ceases. It must, therefore, be continued for one to two hours, and then be repeated at longer intervals, until the reddened epidermis is bleached and shriveled, or until any blisters that may have formed have opened and discharged, which will take place in from six to twelve hours. Care must be taken, especially where the surface to be treated is large, that the vapor of the alcohol does not affect the patient.

PULSATIONS PER MINUTE OF ANIMALS.—Watel's Veterinary Pathology gives the following as the number of pulsations in a minute, in a state of health, in the under-mentioned animals: Horse, 32 to 38; ox or cow, 35 to 42; sheep, 70 to 76; goat, 72 to 79; cat, 110 to 120; hare, 120; dog, 90 to 100; crow, 136; duck, 136; hen, 140; heron, 200.

THE INVALID.—A PEN PICTURE.

See her pallid countenance, but a short time ago the picture of ruddy health, the envy of the school and the pride of the household. She was always welcomed by her schoolmates, for her lithe form and pleasing disposition carried cheerfulness into their ranks. Diligent, punctual and exemplary, obedient and graceful at home, she won the hearts of all. But, alas! we are sorrowed. Those rosy cheeks and ruddy lips are blanched by Consumption. The voice, once so enchanting in laugh and song, is feeble, husky and supplanted by a hollow cough. Let us approach her couch gently and take her hand. Do not shudder because of the feeble and passionless grasp. The hand, once so hearty and plump, is emaciated and shows bony outlines, while the cords and tortuous veins are plainly mapped upon the surface. The pulse that bounded with repletion, carrying vigor to the whole system, and imparting life, beauty, vivacity, health and strength, is delicate to the touch. The feeble heart cannot propel the thin, scanty blood with force. Must we lose her while yet in her teens? Companions and friends gather around with words of cheer and consolation, and depart with moistened eyes and silent steps. Must we lose her? No, there is relief! We can stay this destroyer of our happiness and not suffer the loss of so bright a gem. Something more is required now than dietary and hygienic observance, for nature calls for aid, and she shall have it. Take this pleasant medicine. It is invigorating. How it allays the irritable cough, improves the appetite and digestion, and sends a healthy tingle through the frame. The blood is enriched, nervous force increased, and the heart bounds with a new impulse. See her face brighten by degrees; the color is returning, her voice is getting clearer, and pleasant words are spoken. The strength falters yet, but is gaining. Let us take her out in the warm sunshine. In a short time she will be able to go without our aid, a cheerful girl. This delightful medicine must be God-blessed. It is restoring health to our loved one. She is emerging from her sickness sweeter and nobler than before, and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery must have the credit. It has raised her.

S. R. Eglar, druggist, of West Union, Ohio, says that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has effected a wonderful cure of Consumption in his neighborhood.

"Tell It All"

A Life's Experience in Mormonism. By Mrs. T. B. H. Stenhouse, of Salt Lake City. With an Introduction by Harriet Beecher Stowe. This genuine Autobiography of an educated lady, whose life has been spent in Polygamy. She tells the story of her life—of the mysteries, ceremonies, and doctrines of the Saints. It discloses the real story of "Ann Eliza Young—Wife No. 19," told in full by herself. Complete in detail, delicate in style, "stranger than fiction, more thrilling than romance." It is THE ONLY GENUINE BOOK upon the subject EVER WRITTEN BY A REAL MORMON WOMAN. Endorsed by Governors, Chief-Justices, Judges, Bishops, Clergy, and eminent women, as of wonderful interest, truthful bold, and good. CAUTION.—All other books professing to be written by Mormon women ARE IMPOSITIONS. See that your book contains Mrs. Stenhouse's Introduction. 100,000 will be sold. TO THE SUFFERERS WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this dreadful disease, with this medicine; and, what astonishes most, the patient recovered by the use of a single bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism; and should the patient not recover by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not affected with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

The Forty-First Annual Course of Instruction

In this Department will commence on Monday, the Sixteenth of NOVEMBER, 1874, and terminate on the third Saturday of March, 1875. Preliminary Lectures on Clinical Medicine and Surgery will be delivered in the amphitheater of the great Charity Hospital, beginning on the Twentieth of October, without any charge to the students. The anatomical rooms will be opened at the same time. The members of the Faculty are visiting physicians and surgeons to the Charity Hospital, and give instruction daily at the bedside of the sick.

FEES.—As the practical advantages afforded in New Orleans for a thorough acquaintance with all the branches of medicine are quite as great as if not superior to those offered by the schools of New York and Philadelphia, the same fees are demanded. For all the Lectures, $140; Matriculation, $5; Practical Anatomy, $10; Graduation, $30. Payment required in advance.

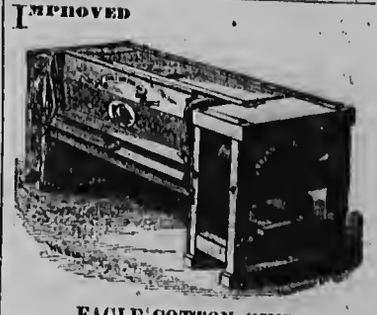
IMPROVED



EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the nineteenth instant:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	1,509
Lake		2
Mobile		32
Total		1,552

On Saturday there being nothing in the early dispatches to stimulate the demand, the market opened with only a limited inquiry, but still there was some looking around, and up to noon 500 bales had changed hands at irregular and easier prices, after which the movement was rather stronger, and there were further sales of 750 bales, making the total 1,250 bales. Low middling sold at 15¾, 15¾@16c., but there were also sales as low as 15¾c., and at the close 15¾c. appeared to be the highest that we could fairly set down as the outside rate for that grade. Strict low middling sold at 16¾c. On Monday a list of 850 bales strict low middling changed hands early in the morning at 16¾c., which showed a material concession from the previous pretensions of the sellers, but which, as the market had been thoroughly tested for several days, was evidently the best that could be done. In addition to this there were other transactions which swelled the business, up to one P. M., to about 1,200 bales, after which we heard of additional sales, making the total 2,000 bales. On Tuesday about 600 bales changed hands at steadier prices, without any quotable variation, after which the movement was more active, resulting in additional transactions to the extent of 850 bales, mostly at figures indicating an advance of ⅛c., making the total for the day 1,450 bales.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 4,700 bales, against 4,400 for the corresponding time last week and 2,500 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,294,420 bales, against 1,197,826 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 263,320 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 1,330 to Great Britain, of 16,044 to France, and of 120,199 to other foreign ports. Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

DOMESTIC.

CHARLESTON, June 25.—Governor Moses, of South Carolina, has pardoned three county commissioners of Barnwell, lately convicted of corruption and thieving, and sentenced respectively three, nine and ten years in the penitentiary. The convicted officials, on their way to the penitentiary, boasted that Governor Moses would not dare allow them to remain in the penitentiary one month.

WASHINGTON, June 25.—Congratulatory messages passed over the cable to-day between the Emperor of Brazil and President Grant. The following is the President's reply:

To the Emperor of Brazil, Rio de Janeiro:

I congratulate you upon the telegraphic connection just established between Brazil and the United States. May it prove as close a link in national friendship as in communication. U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, June 26.—Mr. Hale assumes the postmaster generalship on July 1.

First Treasurer Spinner has issued a call on the national banks, other than gold banks, requiring them to deposit five per cent. of their circulation in United States notes.

Perhaps one of the most important measures passed by Congress for many years is Congressman Morey's bill authorizing the President to appoint a commission of engineers, composed of three army and two civil engineers, to report at the next session, through the President, a plan for the permanent redemption and reclamation of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi river.

The board will probably consist of the following officers of the army: General G. K. Warren, United States engineer; General H. L. Abbott, United States engineer; the civil engineers are Governor P. O. Hebert, of Louisiana, and John Hickles, of Arkansas.

The requirements of the military service may necessitate a change of the army engineers, but the appointment of the civil engineers is fixed. The board will probably meet at Newport for organization.

GALVESTON, June 27.—The Southern delegations returned from Denver to Kansas City to-day. Invitations have been extended to them by the officers of the different railroads to visit Hannibal, St. Joe, St. Louis, Chicago, Quincy, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Atchison, Topeka and Omaha. The Western journals speak most favorably of the great Western movement, with Galveston as the export.

ST. LOUIS, June 27.—A late Leavenworth Times says that mail advices from Dodge City, Kansas, confirm the telegraphic reports that the Indians in that vicinity have assumed a hostile attitude and are murdering citizens and committing depredations on property.

They killed a man named Warren, near Mulberry Creek, and took his entire scalp off. Two hunters were killed at Doby Wells; four soldiers from Camp Supply were wounded, and a lot of stock run off. A party of leading citizens of Dodge City, including Hon. James Hanrahan, who started for Canadian river, in Texas, on the seventh instant, were attacked and all the stock was captured, and it is feared the whole party have been murdered, as nothing can be heard of them. Two men were killed near Canadian river. Lieutenant Crandall, with a squad of eighteen soldiers, is out hunting for the murderers.

FOREIGN.

CITY OF MEXICO, June 21.—A terrible disease, the character of which is unknown, has broken out in Hamaulipas and become epidemic. The Government is assisting the inhabitants, and has adopted measures to prevent the spreading of the malady. The State of Guanajuato offers premiums for the production and manufacture of silk and cotton, also for the best specimens of wine and brandy produced in the State. No differential dues are hereafter to be imposed on goods imported into the State of Yucatan under a foreign flag.

LONDON, June 24.—The relations between Turkey and Persia are not friendly. It appears that the Persian government has refused to comply with the return to Turkish territory of a tribe, numbering twenty thousand families, which has been subject to the Porte, but escaped across the Persian frontier, and that a number of Turks have been seized and ill-treated by a band of Persian plunderers.

The Turkish government threatens to force Persia to give up the persons who have abused its subjects unless to surrender the revolting tribe. Unless accommodation is speedily effected the relations of the two countries will become critical.

PARIS, June 25.—There was considerable excitement in this city last evening, in consequence of anti-papal demonstrations. Several of the disorders of disorder were arrested and order was restored.

MADRID, June 29.—Dispatches have been received by the government this morning conveying the startling news that Marshal Concha was killed yesterday in the attack by the Republican troops upon the Carlist intrenchments at Muro, three kilometers from Estella.

When the national forces learned the death of their commander they pursued to their former positions without disorder, leaving no trophy in the hands of the enemy. The command of the Republican army will be taken by General Lobola, president of the council and minister of war.

LONDON, June 30.—It is reported that the Catholic Bishops in session at Fulda last week have sent conciliatory proposals to Berlin.

The Communists in this city gave a banquet to Jourde and Groisset last night.

The correspondent of the Daily News telegraphs from Rome that the Pope is growing weaker daily, and several foreign representatives have notified their governments to that effect.

A special to the Times, from Madrid, says the army of the north will continue its operations against Estella.

MADRID, June 30.—Official dispatches place the loss of the national troops in the engagement before Estella at fifteen hundred.

Concha, after taking Albarzusa, marched directly upon Estella. He found the Carlists massed at Muro, behind the intrenchments.

A general charge was ordered. Concha placed himself at the head of the troops, taking his position in the center of the first line. While advancing rapidly with the entire line, he received a ball in the chest, fell from his horse and died almost instantly.

General Echaguo then took command and ordered the army to retreat to Oterza, Larraga, Berbinzana and Tafalla.

Marshal Serrano has just arrived in the city.

Eighteen cannon have been dispatched to the army of the north. The government is organizing fifty battalions for immediate service. The spirit of the army is still good, and a very determined feeling prevails in Madrid.

The body of General Concha will arrive here to-morrow, and will have an imposing funeral.

Coggia's Comet.

HOW TO FIND THE NEW COMET—NOW ON EXHIBITION EVERY CLEAR NIGHT.

The comet now approaching the earth was first discovered at the observatory of Marseilles, France, by Mons. Coggia, assistant astronomer there, on April 17. Its position at nine o'clock last night was 7 hours 20 minutes right ascension, 69° 58′ north declination. The tail, resembling a half-opened fan, is about half a degree in length, but, as the course of its progress is not directly toward the earth, it is anticipated that in four weeks from the present time this appendage will show to much greater advantage. When the atmosphere is free from clouds stars can at present be distinctly seen through the nebulous haze surrounding the head of the comet and forming the tail. Though visible to the eye, unaided by any instrument, its precise position must, to be so seen, be very accurately determined. This may be arrived at by adopting the following process:

PROF. DUDLEY'S DIRECTIONS.

Draw an imaginary line from Gamma in "the Dipper" through Alpha in the same constellation, continue it for twice the distance intervening between those two points; draw another line from Gamma to Beta of the "Little Bear;" at the intersection of these lines, which should be about thirty degrees above the horizon, the comet may be seen at nine P. M.

A good telescope or binocular can be availed of as a very material aid, care being first taken to bring the instrument to a proper focus by previously trying its power on any fixed star, and adjusting it thereby to the requirements of the sight.

The comet is at present surrounded by a number of ill-defined stars forming the breast of the "Camelopard," which render it, even with the aid of an astronomical telescope, by no means easy of detection. But as it is nightly exhibiting increased brilliancy and magnitude, and will continue to do so if it follows the path already traversed for nearly two months to come, it is expected that many valuable and interesting features of such erratic visitors may be observed and recorded.

The position of our present visitor is on Proctor's map just above the small arrow next west of stars forty-two and forty-three of Camelus (the Camelopard.)—New York Herald.

ON Saturday morning, June 27, Judge Woods rendered a very elaborate and lengthy decision on the motion for a new trial in the Grant parish case, which was so ably argued on the twentieth instant by counsel for defense.

Judge Woods set forth in his decision that no precedent had been established in cases similar to the grounds on which the motion for a new trial is based, and quoted copious authority in support of his assertion; therefore he decided that sufficient evidence had not been adduced to warrant him in granting their motion. The prisoners, William Crukshank, Bill Irwin and William P. Hadnot, were then remanded to prison to await sentence.—New Orleans Times.

EVERY kindly word and feeling, every good deed and thought, every noble action and impulse, is like the ark-sent dove, and returns from the troubled waters of life bearing a green olive-branch to the soul.

GREAT moral reforms, like the birth of the Savior, came into the world in obscurity. They are trifling things which the grave historian of the day will not stoop to record.

THE POET of the Boston Advertiser has embalmed the late heresy trial in verse as follows:

"You must keep," quoth the strict Dr. Patton,
"The straight Presbyterian hat on."
"I shall do no such thing," quoth
Said the liberal Swing;
"Sooner perish than always feel that on."

"Then vengeance," cried stiff Dr. Patton,
"Will spring, as a cat does a rat on;
For the charges I bring
Will sure make you Swing!"
Then straightway his high horse he got on.

The council then called by bold Patton,
The subject had many a chat on;
But the charges fell flat,
And so did the hat,
Which the council in wisdom then sat on.

Santa Anna Interviewed.

General Santa Anna having returned to this city after eighteen years of banishment, I went to see him at his residence in Calle Vergara. Having been well acquainted with this prominent man when at the height of his power in 1856, and on the point of placing a crown on his head, I was much struck with the difference of now and then. At that time the streets were crowded to look at the "Su Alteza," when driving with a large escort to the Pasoe, and now I found Dos Antonio Lopez living in the plainest style, an old man, without ambition, his face full of wrinkles, but still marching pretty erect, in spite of artificial leg. Though approaching the age of eighty years, his black though scanty hair, and his whole appearance is that of a man of sixty. General Miguel Androde had the kindness to present me again to his fallen greatness. He received me and several other visitors without any ceremony, and made us sit down near him. To an old invalid officer he gave a tender abrazo, calling him mi veterano, and inquiring after old companions in arms, many of whom had died already. "I have returned to Mexico," he said, "because my native country has too much attraction for me. When I was asked abroad: 'Why do you long for your ungrateful country?' I answered that I wanted to be buried where my lost foot was resting. I now feel as if I had come to a strange land. Already at Vera Cruz, when asking for old friends, I was invariably answered: 'Dead!' A whole generation has passed over me, and, like the sands of the desert, the years are heaped on my head. I met on the road an old man with a white beard, who was my god-child, and whom I held in my arms when christened, in 1822. I have become a stranger to all parties. I have no ambition. I am astonished at everything I now see in this country, but I hope yet to find a last resting-place."

He told us the curious story about his lost leg, and in the following words: "Regarding my foot, I must mention that I believed it lost when the riddle took it from the tomb on the sixth of December, 1841, and dragged it through the streets; but yesterday a lady came to see me, telling me that her husband, who was an old colonel in the Mexican army, had preserved it, and recommended her to return it to me if I should ever come back to Mexico. I am expecting this gift to-day at noon. I consider this conduct the more praiseworthy because the gift might have been made in 1853, when I was president, but then this action would have been considered an adulation." He had scarcely finished these words when the lady arrived with the promised foot. Dos Antonio opened the box and examined his relic with interest. The foot was perfectly mummified, but well preserved.—Mexican Correspondent of Alta California.

THE SYLVESTER-LARNED INSTITUTE.—The commencement exercises of the Sylvester-Larned Institute took place last evening, June 25, in the First Presbyterian church, attracting quite a large assemblage. The ceremony opened with prayer, after which Mme. Comes sang in her best manner the solo, "Vaditelie," from "Robert le Diable." Dr. Palmer then delivered an address full of good advice and trite maxims, dwelling at great length on the art of conversation. He treated this subject in the masterly and exhaustive manner expected from a gentleman of great learning and research.

Following the address of Dr. Palmer, Mrs. Broaddus sung an aria from "Pygmalion" in a splendid manner, after which the diplomas were conferred on the graduating class. Owing to the unavoidable absence of Judge Lea, this was done by Mr. W. O. Rogers. The young ladies were called up in the order given, and with a graceful bow each received that for which she had doubtless striven so hard during the past session of the institute. Miss Alice Blanc was the first to receive the valuable prize. Next came Miss Florence Carter; following came Miss Olive Morse Higgins, who blushingly received her scroll of fame, and joined her lucky companions. Miss Mary Kincaid, Miss Eliza Leovy, Miss Virginia Marr, Miss Bettie Parham, and lastly Miss Katie Rodd, completed the class. Mr. Rogers complimented the young ladies on the successful issue of their studies, and their deportment while members of the institute. The class expressed their thanks and resumed their seats. Another magnificent solo by Mme. Comes, the benediction, and the end of the commencement exercises of the Sylvester-Larned Institute were reached for 1874.—New Orleans Times.

IN THE morning think what thou hast to do, and at night ask what thou hast done.

Thomas Maddin, D. D.

From Bishop McTyeire's discourse at the funeral of Dr. Maddin we make the following extract:

Thousands living and dead, in the valley of the Mississippi, bless God that the steps of this messenger of peace were directed this way. With three young friends he bought a skiff at Pittsburg, and, throwing their bark on the bosom of the Ohio, they set out for the Falls (Louisville,) seven hundred and fifty miles away. Arrived in Kentucky he began life with five things: an empty purse, a good conscience, a willing mind, a sound body and a church letter. The last introduced him, and in his peculiar way he was soon exhorting, in answer to calls from every quarter. I take it he was always an agreeable and fluent speaker. The root of the matter was in him—the love of God, the love of souls, and assurance, by experience, that Jesus could and would forgive sins. He says:

"I remonstrated against the wishes of friends to receive license to preach, only asking for the privilege of holding meetings for those who kindly invited me to do so, not expecting over to take the high position of a preacher of the gospel, for which I did not think I was at all qualified. Occupying this strange position, I was an enigma to myself, delighting in trying to preach, and yet resisting all the wishes of my friends to accept of license to preach. In the fall of 1818, at the solicitation of the venerable James Ward, I consented that he should present my name to the Quarterly Conference of Jefferson circuit, then in session, as a candidate for the ministry. I was accepted and licensed to preach. Mr. Ward now said: 'Tommy, would you like to travel?' I replied: 'You have made me a preacher; you can do what you please now.' I was recommended as a suitable person to be received into the Tennessee Annual Conference on trial. I was received and appointed to the Stones River circuit, in charge of that work, so scarce were preachers in those days."

This was in October, 1818. The Conference was held in Nashville. His friend Hooper joined at the same time. It was a class of nineteen. Robert Paine was in it, and eighteen others, an unusual proportion of whom became men of mark. Bishop Paine having been, by his office, removed from the Conference, Thomas Maddin for several years has been the senior member of the Conference.

You know the rest, or your fathers knew it, or their fathers. In Shelbyville, 1868, at the session of the Conference, he delivered his semi-centennial sermon. None who were present can forget it. The only thing that discounted the occasion was the modesty that would not let him talk about himself as much as we wanted to hear.

You, or your fathers, or their fathers! So in truth did this ministry, ordained of Heaven, reach three generations, and bless them all.

He located a short time, making his home at Columbia, but re-entered the itinerant ministry in 1837. With the exception of a few years spent in Kentucky, this long and laborious ministry has been devoted principally to middle Tennessee and north Alabama, once connected with the Tennessee Conference. A few years ago he was retired on the list of superannuated preachers. He retired not from labor. As chaplain of the Hospital for the Insane he has ministered with a tenderness and gentleness peculiar to himself, and specially grateful to those unfortunates; at the same time to the edification of the few but intelligent persons who made up his Sunday congregations.

He ministered not carelessly. His oil for the sanctuary was beaten. To-day he was to have preached. On Friday, the nineteenth, his last day, he finished writing his last sermon. The text is Revelation xiv, 1 to 5 inclusive: "And I looked, and lo, a Lamb stood on the Mount Zion, and with him an hundred and forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads," etc.

On that evening he went out to take tea with a friend, in usual health. He soon returned, and was met by one of his sons and conducted to his room. He died the next morning.

He spoke no word—there was not time. We needed none from him. His last thoughts were on the one hundred and forty-four thousand. He is one of them "redeemed from the earth." His sermon began by acknowledging the mystery of the text; it is clear to him now. He mingles not in our songs to-day; doubtless "the voice of harpers harping with their harps" has greeted him.

To review such a ministry is not a task to be undertaken. Suffice it to indicate a few of the most striking points of the minister:

1. He began early. If a man would do a good day's work at anything he must not only work late, but begin soon. Hence the utility and propriety and beauty of youthful consecration to God.

2. By nature he had a pleasing speech and a winning address, and this gift was sanctified by grace and enlarged in the use. Of fine poetic temperament, he had an eye for the beautiful and the grand in the moral as well as the material world, and he glowed and kindled in the description. This produced a style that pleases at once the uncultivated and the refined. The account is, and I can well believe it, that the days of his youth and middle age in the pulpit furnished memorable occasions of power. His high and sustained position as a preacher stood upon real achievements; and by his ministry much people was added unto the Lord.

3. He was eminently a man of principle. What was right was law to him. He did not make much noise about his principles, but he had them, and quietly, unchangeably, there he took his stand. With a charming blandness of manner, he was firm, steadfast. This secured truth and integrity—those pillars of character. In the outset of his religious career this trait was severely tested.

What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns me not to do,
This teach me more than hell to shun,
That more than heaven pursue.

4. Devotion to principle as a man was underlaid by firm faith in God as a Christian. He endured, as seeing him who is invisible. He counted on the future with certainty. He held God to be faithful in his promises. His experience was so bright and unequivocal that it furnished the staple of much of his teaching. Forgiveness of sins, the joy of the Holy Ghost, the witnessing Spirit—these were no myths, no figures of speech with him. They were realities. No cunningly-devised fables were here; he felt it, he knew it, he testified it. That glorious fact—the forgiveness of sins, consciously experienced—was gloriously emphasized in the course of his successful ministry.

5. The unction of the Holy Ghost was upon him. No doubt his commission was from above. From the beginning there was fruit. He looked to and relied on the co-operating Spirit.

Though I had heard of him before, my personal acquaintance began after he was an old man. How beautiful was that old age! His heart was fresh, ever. The hoary head was a crown of glory, being found in the way of righteousness. In our church convocations—in Annual and District Conferences—his visits of late years have been specially useful. He stood forth—his modesty being overcome by our persuasions—and talked so encouragingly to his young brethren: "Go on, work on, trust God—he will take care of you. He has taken care of me often when extremities seemed at hand. My heavenly Father has been better than all my fears."

It is no small honor when an old servant gives a good character to his Master. This was Father Maddin's last peculiar mission. A young man cannot bear this testimony with the force of one who has been young and now is old. His life was a success. Without reproach, and blameless, he lived. He has left a good name, as well as done a good work. He saw his children and children's children, to the fourth generation, and they blessed him; and he died with the sound of their voices upon his ear. Nothing was lacking but that which now will be given!

Blessed are the people to whom God sends such messengers of peace! Blessed is the church that hath its ministry full of them! Blessed is the man who so faithfully fulfills his mission!

Readville Seminary.

MR. EDITOR: It is sometimes well to turn from the noises that stun, from the glare that dazzles, or from the gloom which oppresses, to the silence in which one may catch the undertone of truth, look at the work which has worth without glitter, and see the focalized light which will do somewhat to dispel the gloom.

Readville Seminary is one of the real centers of worthful work and light-gathering power. It was the fortune of the writer to witness the examination of classes in intellectual philosophy, morals and manners, chemistry, rhetoric and moral science. The examination was thorough, and the result triumphantly asserted the diligence and capacity of the pupils, and the assiduity and wisdom of the instructresses. Even dullness and prejudice could not resist the conviction that teachers and taught had done honest work.

The closing exercises were skillfully arranged and admirably conducted. The five young ladies of the graduating class on that day acquired a fuller emphasis for the distinction they had already won. The address of a former graduate to the alumni was full of womanly thought, gracefully expressed. The music, instrumental and vocal, was well performed. Prof. Magruder, as president of the board of trustees, conferred upon the graduates the degree of mistress of English literature, and accompanied the presentation of diplomas by eminently appropriate remarks. The address of Mr. Goodale to the graduating class was marked by an earnest Christian spirit, by symmetrical completeness, elevated thought and a wealth of purifying truth. The things said were such as, if rightly received and well applied, cannot fail to develop a fuller womanhood and give a nobler rhythm to life. The things said were such, too, as men need to hear, and ought earnestly and reverently to accept. It is perhaps well known, but still is worth repeating, that parents who wish their daughters well trained can obtain the service they desire at Readville Seminary. VISITOR.

POSTPONEMENT.—Mr. Editor: Will you be so kind as to announce in the ADVOCATE that the District Conference of Summit district, Mississippi Conference, is postponed from the second Sunday in July until October? Circumstances required the postponement.

A. B. NICHOLSON, P. E.

Alexandria, Louisiana.

A GOOD MEETING.

MR. EDITOR: Alexandria is the seat of the next Conference, and already the town and surrounding country begin to brace themselves for that momentous occasion. Eggs can be bought now for twelve and a half cents a dozen, in trade, which gives good prospect for feathers by January 6, 1875. New rooms are going up in the rear, into which the families will move, leaving their front rooms for the preachers. Only yesterday saw a shipment of bedsteads being drayed home. One neighborhood talks about moving-time and place of a camp meeting, in order that they may save themselves for Conference. They intend coming in and camping round the preachers, bringing with them enough to care for themselves, their stock and the preachers, of corn, venison, beds, ducks and the like. Plenty of house-room to be had in Alexandria and Pineville, and a large four-acre church lot to camp in.

We have not been overflowed in this section. We are very dry, hydrostatically and financially. If we can do this much in the dry, what may we not look for when the crops and the preachers are gathered. This place is two—double action on this station. We have two towns to entertain one Conference. We want two Bishops, one for Pineville and one for Alexandria. The towns face each other, resting on opposite sides of Red river; steam ferry between. Alexandria glories in a parsonage and Pineville in a church. Conference to be held in Alexandria, the revival in Pineville. More than all this, we are getting ready for Conference by preaching and singing, praying and talking.

Last Monday ended a meeting of thirteen days. Bros. Clay and Wynn, the presiding elder and the preacher in charge, were honored and blessed in their labors by the Holy Spirit's presence. He was there, convincing and convicting, adopting and teaching. He photographed some faces with such a blessed light that they did shine like the face of Christ.

We had mothers at the altar and their children by them. Prayer ceased to be general, and was personal. Friend prayed for friend, father for son, and then the whole church would bend their power and faith upon the lost of the lost. Then came the answer. The Spirit took the care to bless first the most hopeless—those without God in the church; two or three backsliders saved, and the precedent was fixed. The common sinners—those without God in the world—were saved abundantly. About thirty took out a new lease, and began a new life with a new birth. Every night a large attendance. The sexton says: "Full outside and in."

The eight o'clock morning prayer and experience meetings were the best. The power reached both towns and spread out in the pine woods. The old ferry, that has never been known to move after sundown, was among the penitents, for eleven o'clock at night found her puffing and moaning, while from her sooty throat went up ten thousand sparks of fire. That constant and devoted attendant of revivals, the devil, gave proof of the genuineness of the meeting by his presence. Assuming various forms, he was quite conspicuous, now in the person of a well-dressed woman, then in a prematurely old boy, cravated and perfumed. Had proof of his ubiquity, for one night he was inside the church in the babies and outside in the beasts, at the same moment. We never once yielded. We met him the next night with the broken body and shed blood of our Lord. We knew the power, and so we began with the sacrament. We came off more than conquerors that night.

We have twenty-seven members to receive into full connection, and would have had twenty-eight had the priest only said the word. There was one person attending all the services, very desirous of joining us, who very modestly and in good faith asked permission to unite with the Methodist Church. The priest objected. Suppose he is not empowered to give dispensations.

A LOOKER-ON.

ALEXANDRIA, June 20, 1874.

BURNED FOR SORCERY.—On the fourth of last month one Jose Maria Bonilla and his wife Diega were arrested by order of Senor Castilla, the Alcalde of Jacobo, in the State of Sinaloa, Mexico, on a charge of sorcery, and were summarily tried, convicted and sentenced to be burned to death. It was "proved," to the satisfaction of the authorities, that the accused had bewitched one Silvestre Zacarias. The brief details furnished exhibit a curious state of society. It is said that, on the day before the execution, citizen Porras, as a final test, made Zacarias take three swallows of the blessed water, whereupon the latter vomited fragments of a blanket and bunches of hair. The Alcalde states that the people were exasperated against the sorcerers, and demanded that they be burned. The sentence was executed with his approval, and he adds that he has his eye on other sorcerers against whom complaints have been made by the citizens. The official Diario of Mexico confirms the report of the outrage, and says several families in the town have since compelled the officer to burn another old woman and her son for the same cause. The general government has asked the authorities of Sinaloa to send a detailed report of these proceedings, and to take measures to protect the lives of persons threatened with similar violence.

COURAGE.

BY MRS. CELIA THAXTER.

Because I hold it sinful to despond,
And will not let the bitterness of life
Blind me with burning tears, but look beyond
Its tumult and its strife;

Because I lift my head above the mist,
Where the sun shines and the broad breezes blow,
By every ray and every rain-drop kissed
That God's love doth bestow;

Think you I find no bitterness at all,
No burden to be borne like Christian's pack?
Think you there are no ready tears to fall
Because I keep them back?

Why should I hug life's ills with cold reserve?
To curse myself and all who love me? Nay!
A thousand times more good than I deserve
God gives me every day.

And in each one of these rebellious tears,
Kept bravely back, he makes a rainbow shine;
Grateful I take his slightest gift! No fears
Nor any doubts are mine.

Dark skies must clear, and when the clouds are past
One golden day redeems the weary year.
Patient I listen, sure that sweet at last
Will sound his voice of cheer.

Then vex me not with chiding. Let me be.
I must be glad and grateful to the end.
I grudge you not your cold and darkness. Me
The powers of light befriend.

A Requisition of the Past.

It is declared in the Bible that "God requireth that which is past." Whatever may be the meaning of this passage, as used there, it is certainly suggestive of a very important truth. There is an intimate and indissoluble connection between the present and the past. What would we be—what would anything be—without our past history? We would not be at all. And as we depend upon the past for our present existence, so we depend upon it for our present attainments. Our present attainments of physical stature and strength are the result of past care and exercise. The "sincere milk," and innocent sports of childhood, the more adventurous frolics of youth, and the "strong meat" and severe toil of mature age, all combine to make up complete manhood.

It is the same with mental development. The mind does not fortuitously spring into the full vigor of maturity. It advances step by step in obedience to a uniform law of progress. The present powers of the philosopher have an indispensable relation to his first lesson in literature, which he learned while a boy at the knee of his preceptor.

This same is the case with moral development. No arbitrary power can transform a human soul into a morally upright being. Moral development is attained, like mental, by rigid training. I know it is a law of Christianity that a man may, through supernatural grace, be released in a moment from guilt and deficiency. But even then he has not a fully-developed moral character, and he cannot have until he has gone through the school of Christian discipleship. The law of Christianity and the law of nature are one in this respect.

One more instance might be cited—experience. This, perhaps, comes more within the purview of consciousness than any other. We need cite no law, except the law of experience itself. Its processes every rational being is conscious of. The child need not be told that fire will burn, after it has once grasped the flame. Experience is invaluable. There are many things we know by it that we cannot learn by scientific investigation. There is more dependence upon it than upon any other law. Blot out all experience, and man would have to begin life over again.

So we see clearly that the past is required. All those days of struggle and victory, the alternations between darkness and light, between despair and hope, have combined and passed into the circulation of the moral system, and by their assimilating processes we see now before us fully-developed character. There is a lesson in this that must have a present application. We must make the present the past. If the past is required, what sort ought it to be? The question is easily answered: It ought to be such as would make us as good as possible at the present. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall be also reap." The harvest bears an invariable resemblance to the seed sown. The physically weak have been remiss in physical exertion. The mentally imbecile have lacked mental application. The morally corrupt have been wanting in moral training. From past neglects, then, we may be seriously at fault at present. Our past may be all deranged, and our house out of order. But we have not yet reached the extreme limit of life. We may make a new past. "A living dog is better than a dead lion." The best of our days may have already passed, but "while there is life there is hope." We know that by nature the Ethioplan cannot change his skin nor the leopard his spots, but there is a gracious law of Christianity by which those who are accustomed to do evil may learn to do good. The old past may not be essentially changed, but the new past may so countervail its effects as to make us "new creatures." Then it is what we do to-day that is to affect our future. How momentous the present!

"On what a slender thread Eternal interests hang!"

No wonder the Bible lays such stress on the present moment. "To-day, if you will hear his voice, harden not your heart." "Behold, now is the accepted time! Behold, now is the day of salvation!" And this warning becomes the more significant if we consider that this may be the last day. "Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." Not another day between me and the judgment! This the last day, and it rapidly passing! Nothing behind but a long catalogue of black deeds—nothing before but an avenging God! How shall one stand? "There is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." It must be proclaimed, then: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still;" for "God requireth that which is past." M.

Church Membership.

MR. EDITOR: This subject has been discussed at length in our papers. I will not attempt to take sides with either party, and I only write for the benefit of the many who are disturbed in their faith by reading these articles in the papers. The Methodist people, as a whole, have always been taught that it was the duty of all who had made up their minds to become religious to join the church at once, and to seek religion simply as the whole Bible teaches in the practice of religion. The church has been deficient in the definition of man's real condition and relation to God. If you will allow me I will give the true position of man in this respect. Adam was created not morally holy, but by creation perfect. He did not fall from grace, nor from the church, for there was no grace. He fell from the holiness in which he was created. There was no child born on that platform from which he fell. There was no child born between the platforms of holiness and grace. God in Christ lifted Adam and his posterity from the fall, and placed them all on the platform of grace.

We thus judge, says St. Paul, that if one died for all, then were all dead, and that he died for all. All the race of Adam are born in Christ, or in grace, or under a dispensation of grace; more properly, all are born in the church, for Christ is the church—the all and the in all of the church. There is no place for a child to be born but in grace or in the church. There is no place for a child to be born but in providence; and I mean by providence seed-time and harvest, summer and winter, cold and heat, day and night—that provision which God has made in providence, by which all men are supported. How could a child live if it could be born out of providence? There is no earth nor air nor seed nor season. The prodigal son was born in his father's house. All men are born in the church or grace of God, and there is but one way for them to get out of the church, and that is to sin out. Adam sinned himself out of the first church or paradise.

There is no salvation out of the church, no Christ out of Christ, no support outside of providence. It is profound nonsense to talk or preach about a man's getting back to the church by staying out of the church. The prodigal son went off, and he only got back by coming back. The first thing all true penitents ought to do is to return to the church, and the first thing all men who hope to become penitent ought to do is to join the church and obey God's commands, that they may become penitent. No man can get religion outside of religion; and to talk or write about a man's staying out of the church until he is converted is to teach Calvinism, which is to teach nonsense. A man talking of making a living outside of providence, where utter nothing is, and where he cannot for a moment exist himself, is no part of Methodism. No preacher has a right, by his commission, to keep any man or woman on earth from coming back to the church. The preacher has a right, with the church, to turn away from their communion sinners, but no right to bar their return. Sin persisted in is the only door out of the kingdom of God. The church is ordained of God for the salvation of the world. Christ has opened the way for all to return who have gone out.

A man is only religious as he believes and practices religion; and God has directed his faith and secured the evidence on which it is to rest, and plainly prescribed the means to the end. All men must practice religion to be religious, and the first thing parents ought to do in the way of religion for their children, except pray for them, is to acknowledge their relation to the atonement by having them baptized, teach them to pray, believe and obey God, simply to accept of the plan of salvation as God has ordained it, and practice according to the pattern given us in Christ. God made the earth and seasons before he made the acron, and after Adam fell. God provided the church in Christ before a child of Adam was born, or not one ever would have been born, never could have been born; for Adam would have been executed, and the race would have perished in him. I was opposed to any change in our Discipline on that subject. It was just right. Give a man a fair chance to test his sincerity in his return to God by affording all the means of grace. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." The church is no experiment in her power in Christ to save even the chief of sinners, but a fact of experience, which all men may try.

A Paper That Don't Suit.

MR. EDITOR: Away off here in our own beautiful Louisiana we read with interest the Independent, and many a time has our spirit been fed and our hearts made strong with "the bread and wine of its quiet thoughts." And yet we cannot exactly say we welcome the Independent to our homes. Too many thorns are hid away amid the flowers; too often the bitter is mingled with the sweet, and truth and error almost weekly rest side by side in its columns. On Sabbath morning, when we are forced to stay away from our country church because the carriage and horses and driver which the Yankee troops stole from us, during the war, have never been replaced, we would love to have a good religious paper, that would talk to us as a pastor to his people, gently leading us away from the past, with its buried hopes, "beside the still waters," where every tired spirit can drink if it will, and be satisfied. We want to be sure that in this weekly visitor we shall have a friend in whose sympathy we shall find a "balm for our wounds and our tears," who shall fill our minds with Sabbath thoughts, and not feed the gall in our hearts.

But the Independent does not merit from its Southern readers a confidence like this. In all of its correspondence we find traces of that "false and fatal zeal" that caused wild war to desolate our land, and robbed the future of all that made it bright to our gaze. Shedding the blood of our bravest and manliest hearts, making "freemen of our slaves, slaves of our freemen," giving us the blight for the bloom, poverty for luxury, adversity for prosperity, toil and anxiety for rest and security, confusion for order—these are the offerings they have exacted, and yet their zeal against the doomed South still burns and is ever ready with the sword. Even Dr. Cuyler, who seems to us as an angel of light when he tells us "God is Our Helper," and talks of "Godly Sincerity," "The Saved and Lost," "The Seven Last Words of Jesus," until we love him as a true embassador of Christ—even Dr. Cuyler, in his "three hundred articles," rather boasts of what he has done in the great struggle against the South, and calls the selfish, the heady, the ambitious, the coarse, the unprincipled Lincoln "our rustic David."

Dr. Samuel Spear's last article, "The Future of the Colored People," is anything but agreeable to us, and is full of falsehood. He says, among other things: "What remains to be done is thoroughly to kill in the bosom of white people that wicked and unjust prejudice against color, which, having its origin in slavery, should die with it. White children are not instinctive haters and despisers of the negro race. They are taught to hate and despise them by those who have done so before them." Now true Southerners are not despisers of negroes. We are accustomed to them, we were born beneath the same sun, have been fanned by the same winds, watered by the same clouds, and they seem to us as part of our own family. In babyhood we have rested in their arms and felt safe. All along our childhood they have waited upon us, watched us and loved us. Often we have warmed by the same fire, knelt around the same family altar, and no people on earth can feel for them as we do. As we grew to years of maturity we felt it to be our sacred duty to look to the happiness and comfort of those intrusted to our keeping. When they were sick we nursed them, and wiped the death-damp from their brow in the midnight, and heard them call us good, and bless us in their last whispers to earth. Many a time have we taken their little ones upon our lap, when they were sick, and soothed and quieted them to rest. How few of the elegant and cultivated women of the North, before the war, would touch them. While they pitied negroes as slaves, there was something repulsive in their color that made it a trial to Northern teachers in a Southern family to shake hands with our mammy, who was as dear to us almost as our own mother. The North may boast of the wreck and ruin it has brought to Southern hearts and homes; there is no mistake in this; but not of what they have done for the negro. To hear our old servants, when they come in to see us, talk of "the days that are no more," and hear them exclaim: "Oh! did you ever hear of such times?" to hear them tell of their wants and privations, and of how little freedom has done for them, is pitiable indeed.

The intelligent ones of them know they are poorer, more defenseless, more anxious, less free and joyous in spirit, than when they were slaves, and had a good master to provide for them; and whether in winter or in summer, in rain or in drought, in youth or in age, in a destructive overflow or abundant harvest, their bread was sure. No; let us assure you, you are mistaken in regard to our hatred of color. We feel the most kindly solicitude for their welfare. We greatly desire their mental and moral elevation. We wish them educated and taught the religion of the Bible. It is a great grief to us that so little has been done for their improvement, and that to-day they are as ignorant and superstitious as when they were slaves. And yet the largest exercise of Christian charity and kindliness cannot annul the distinctions of race and of nature, or require that they should sit at our tables, attend the same schools with our children, sit in our pews in our churches, or be entertained as guests in our parlors.

Dr. Spear, like many in his latitude, writes, I suppose, of what he has heard or dreamed, not of what he has seen and known of Southerners. We are heartily tired of this unmerited abuse. But we never expect Northern Christians to have enough of charity to love us very dearly, or to recover enough from their blindness to see us in our true character.

"For faith, fanatic faith, once wedded fast
To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last."

Ministerial Support.

MR. EDITOR: If you will allow me a small space in your columns I will say a word or two to delinquent members of the Methodist Church. The reason I use the term "Methodist" is because I am a member of that denomination, and I do not feel at liberty to lecture members of other churches.

My object in writing this is to stir up our members in regard to the support of our ministers. About one-half of the year is now gone, and stewards in these parts have been able to collect but very little of the preacher's salary. How is he to live if we don't pay him? Shall we compel him to go to the field or to the schoolroom to make his bread? If so, we will have poor preaching, because all of his time through the week will be so occupied with secular things that when the Sabbath comes he will have no sermon prepared for the occasion.

When a minister enters the pulpit his congregation expects him to have his sermon well prepared, and to preach it in demonstration of the spirit and with power. Now how can any congregation expect a minister to preach a good and sound sermon without much study and thorough preparation? and how can he study without time? and how can he be expected to have time to devote to the preparation of his sermon when he is all the week occupied in some secular business? The difficulty is that we wait one for another, and we all begin with one consent to make excuse. One will not pay because there is a brother just over there that never does pay anything. Another will not because "Bro. So-and-So" always pays a great deal, and they can get along without his help. But this is not a Christian spirit. The Bible teaches us that they that preach the gospel shall live of the gospel. So if we want the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ preached to us it is our duty to pay for it. "God loves a cheerful giver, and the liberal soul shall be made fat."

Now, Mr. Editor, I am not a fault-finder, but, being a steward of our church, and knowing the failure to support the ministry is often laid to the charge of stewards, I drop these gentle hints to the members to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance. The times are hard; but the gospel is indispensable, and the ministry must be sustained. So come one and all to the rescue. Let us support our pastor in spite of the hard times. STEWARD.

Vermilion Parish, Louisiana.

MR. EDITOR: Our Southern people have been in great commotion for the last thirteen years, and for the last nine years general dissatisfaction and restlessness have prevailed to such an extent that there has been one almost universal inquiry: "Where shall I go?"

Almost all desire to move, and many have sacrificed comfortable homes and removed in almost every direction. There are at least three families around me who, after two years' sojourn in British Honduras, removed to this point.

One man, a native here, removed to west Texas to raise stock on a larger scale, and in two years drove many of them back on account of a two years' drought. Another citizen of Texas removed here because it was a better place to raise stock. So they go. Many objections prevail against every county in every State. For some it is too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, too hilly or too level, etc.

I have been here over three years, and have not had the mercury rise above ninety-two degrees, or below nineteen degrees above zero. This latter occurred one time only, and the first not often. I have never been confined to bed a day; have had a very healthy family, and believe farming and stock-raising combined, for small farmers, promises as sure a living here as anywhere in the Union, with very few exceptions. I commenced writing a series of articles in a Mississippi paper two years ago; but as crops were unpromising, fearing I should mislead some one, I discontinued abruptly. I have no desire now to persuade any one to come here, but with your permission will write a few short papers, giving a fair and candid statement of everything connected with religion, society, politics and crops, that all may be advised before they come. I have friends and acquaintances from North Carolina, my native State, to Texas, and should be far from persuading them to immigrate to this region, and to have them dissatisfied and blame me.

The Creole French population and Roman Catholicism will be found one great objection with many. A stranger can make himself very unpopular with these people, or the reverse, as he likes. I was deterred from practicing medicine here for two years because I was told they would not pay their physician. I have never found a people so willing to pay these bills, according to means.

With the exception of occasional epidemics, much of the sickness is caused by the grossest ignorance of the laws of hygiene. I have heard of several cases of epilepsy, two of which I had under treatment, and generally find it caused by improper living. This horrible disease is easily cured in young people, as a general rule, although it is oftener maltreated than almost any other.

J. B. RAMSEY, M. D.

ABBEVILLE, Vermilion Parish, La., June 17, 1874.

GIVE HIM LIGHT.—If a child wants a light to go to sleep by, give it one. The sort of Spartan firmness which walks off and takes away the candle and shuts all the doors between the household cheer and warm and pleasant stir of evening mirth, and leaves a little son or daughter to hide under the bed-clothes and get to sleep as best it can, is not at all admirable; it is after the pattern of Giant Despair, whose grim delight, confided to Diffidence, his wife, over the miseries of his wretched prisoners, always seem most inhumanly—a perfect picture of the meanness of despotism. Not that the dear mother means to be cruel when she tries this or that hardening process, and treats human nature as if it were clay, to be molded into any shape she may please. Very likely she has no idea whatever of the injury and suffering she causes, or perhaps her heart aches; but she perseveres, thinking she is doing right, and fancies she is teaching her child a lesson of bravery, when perhaps she is making a nervous, imaginative little creature, whose after-life will ever bear the impress of the horrid specters its fancy called up in those moments of lonely banishment. Then give him light, if he wants it!

THE OPEN HEART.—There is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it, while the other closes itself, and the drop runs off. So God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them it is because we will not open our hearts to receive them.

"OH, dear sir," says Brainerd, in writing to a friend, "do not think it enough to live at the rate of commonplace Christianity."

IN thy pursuits, of whatever kind, let this come to mind: "How much shall I value this on my death-bed?" President Edwards.

Obituaries.

HARRIET ELIZABETH, daughter of Culen F. and Mary J. Conerly, of Vernon parish, Louisiana, died April 23, 1874, aged three years, four months and three days. She was a child of more than ordinary promise, admired by all who knew her, and dearly loved by her parents and relations. PHILIP KOONCE.

ALICE OLIVIA MARSHALL was born in Choctaw county, Mississippi, September 13, 1858. She made a profession of religion and joined the church in the fall of 1873, while a student under the wholesome religious influences of the Memphis Conference Female Institute, at Jackson, Tennessee, and continued to exhibit the evidences of the heavenly Guest until she fell asleep in Jesus, on the eighteenth of May, 1874. She was the ninth child whom her almost heart-broken parents have laid in the grave. May God sustain them.

D. S. HEARON.

DIED, at his residence near Lower Peachtree, Alabama, TILMAN INLOW, who was born in South Carolina, January 17, A. D. 1814. He joined the Baptist Church at about the age of eighteen; was married December 23, 1834, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the year 1840, in which he lived a zealous and devoted Christian until May 21, 1874, when God called him to the church triumphant.

Bro. Inlow served in the capacities of a church steward, class-leader and Sabbath school superintendent for many years very acceptably. He was characterized for his devotedness to his pastor, ready at all times and places to defend and sustain him; in fact he was a Methodist in deed. He died as he had lived—in the full triumph of a living faith.

Rest, brother, rest, for thy work is done;
Go, dust, to thy dreamless slumber;
Mount, soul, to the crown and white robe won,
And the bliss of the sainted number.

A. C. HUNDLEY.

HARRIET MCDONALD was born near Augusta, Georgia, August 29, 1798. Her father, Willis McDonald, moved to Jefferson county, Mississippi, when she was one or two years old. He lived there a short time, when he moved to Louisiana, and was there about eleven years. He then moved back to Mississippi, and settled at Clinton. By this time the subject of this sketch was blooming into womanhood. She was married to William Henson in November, 1816, and shortly afterward they moved to Leake county, Mississippi. A large family was the result of their union. About the time she most needed her husband's advice and sympathy, he was ruthlessly killed by one of his servants. This left her with a large family to raise. She succeeded well. She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was converted at Good Hope church, Leake county, Mississippi, in 1835. Of course she adhered to the Methodist Episcopal Church South at the separation, and continued a faithful member until her death, which took place at the residence of her son-in-law, Mr. James Redus, near Hazlehurst, Mississippi, December 10, 1873. She was an aunt of Dr. William H. Watkins, of the Mississippi Conference. The writer had the pleasure of visiting this good woman, as her pastor, in her last illness. She was resigned and ready for her change. She said sometimes she feared she was too anxious to go; that she knew it was her duty to suffer as well as to do the will of God. Her soul would become exultant when she would think of the glory that was shortly to be revealed in her. She died in great peace.

"Lo! the prisoner is released,
Lightened of her fleshly load;
Where the weary are at rest
She is gathered unto God!
Lo! the pain of life is past,
All her warfare now is o'er,
Death and hell behind are cast,
Grief and suffering are no more."

P. A. JOHNSTON.

NAPOLEON B. MOORE died of pneumonia, in Hill City, Texas, February 16, 1874, aged twenty-eight years, five months and twelve days.

Of him we can cherish but one memory, for he was kind, he was good. Possessed of a hearty, jovial nature, he had friends, warm friends, wherever he went. I have often heard his mother speak of his ever-dutiful and unfailing kindness to her. Our first school-days were spent in the same little log schoolhouse, twenty years ago. We had a long walk, but he was ever thoughtful of the little cousin trying to keep pace at his side. He was a good boy, he was a good man, and it should be a strong consolation to his good mother to read this report from his employer: "I have never known a more agreeable young man, or one more attentive to business." In November, 1872, he left his home in Louisiana, hoping to find in Texas a better locality, to which he might carry his widowed mother, sisters and little brothers. But the dream is unfulfilled, the hope is broken and hushed, the buoyant step is still, and the watchers wait for his coming no more. It is trying to bridge over the absence of years even, but the great death-void—alas! who may look up through the first blinding tears and feel: "Thy will be done?" He is said to have made no mention of death in those last suffering hours among stranger friends; but we who know him so well—his long-suffering, uncomplaining way—feel that this was not unnatural. He was a member of the Methodist Church at Douglas, Louisiana, and, while his name is only left to us, we believe that the spirit-band will give him greeting beyond.

We, too, must go. If we are faithful, the same gate will open to let us go home, and we will begin the life eternal. It is the bond of human sympathy—the spirit-link with life—to weep over grief newly given, but the voice of the Shepherd is near; we rest. It is well, it is well!

LAURA A. COLBERT.

BRO. WILLIAM YOUNG DIXON, son of Rev. T. F. Dixon and Sarah A. Dixon, departed this life on the twenty-third of last March, in California, whither he had gone, a few months before, for his health. He was a native of East Feliciana, Louisiana, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South at the age of nine years, at Old Bethel camp ground, and remained a faithful member of the same till his death.

At the age of sixteen he was happily converted on the camp ground at Olive Branch, and from that time was not only faithful and consistent, but he was a happy and useful Christian. He was a graduate of Centenary College, and much beloved by his teachers and schoolmates.

He went to war when war was declared, and remained in the army for some three years or more, till he was wounded before Atlanta. This wound so disabled him that he was able to fight no more; and his physicians thought that the lead which he carried in his mortal body had much to do with his declining health and death.

Of his preparation to depart in peace we should have had no doubt, even if he had left no dying testimony. But he died at the house of his uncle, in that far-off West, and in the arms of some of his relatives, and, having the right use of his reason, spoke freely of his departure. To his uncle, who sat near him, three days before his death, he said: "I know that I shall never reach home alive. I did wish, at one time, that I would have sufficient strength to reach home, but now I see that even if I were to start now, and in good weather, I have not strength enough to take me through. Tell pa and ma, Ella and all of the family, not to grieve for me, for death has no terrors—only that of dying so far from them." And after a little he said: "Tell them I have an abiding faith in eternal salvation. Of this I have not a particle of doubt, for I have made peace with my Redeemer, and see my way clear. Tell them to meet me in heaven," etc. Thus lived and died this young man of God, and his relatives do "not mourn as those who have no hope."

A. G. MILLER.

ON Monday, February 2, 1874, the spirit of SALLIE BRIDGES passed away, without a struggle, to the "house of many mansions," impressing the hearts of her attending friends with this solemn admonition: "Be ye also ready, for in an hour ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

In early life she gave her heart to the Savior, and ever found his love strong to sustain, and his promises precious and consoling in all the trials of life and the afflicting dispensations of Providence. In June, 1853, she was married to Rev. George H. Clinton, and to the close of his life was his companion in the wanderings, a sharer in the privations, and a helpmate in the labors of the Methodist itinerant ministry, ever encouraging and stimulating him to higher and still higher attainments in the divine life, until he became one of the first among the noble band of men who have here no abiding place, but go to proclaim gospel tidings to sin-stricken world. When he had nearly reached the zenith of his ambition, happy in the home in which she was the sunshine, idolized by the flock for whom he toiled and labored to bring into Christ's kingdom, disease crept, like the serpent entering Eden, with insidious step, and cut short his fame and usefulness. She came with him to his boyhood's home, and through long, weary months of pain and sickness nursed him with woman's tender, untiring devotion, until naught was left but the clay of her heart's love. Then, in the bitterest anguish, she felt it harder to say, "Thy will, not mine, O Father, be done," than when she gave back four little angel pledges of their union to nestle in her Savior's bosom. She came to dwell among us in November, 1871, and by her engaging manner, united to a warm heart and loving nature, endeared herself to a large circle of admiring friends—those who knew her best and loved her most.

"Wonder oft what visions of rapture she is holding
That eye hath not seen,
To what strains of heavenly music she is listening
That ear hath not heard,
In what love and delight she is rejoicing
That the heart hath not conceived."

In November, 1872, she was united in marriage with Mr. Thomas J. Fuqua, and found a home which was to her a perpetual delight. She rendered it, by her bright and genial temperament, a paradise of love and affection. The little angel, that was to be the crowning joy in this happy home, went to sleep in the Savior's arms ere it knew a mother's tenderness or a father's love. Happy in the love of a fond husband and affectionate children, surrounded by every comfort that makes this life desirable, she did not cling to earth with strong desire, but often, in days of health and enjoyment, spoke of her departure hence as an event not far in the future. One ungratified wish alone marred a perhaps too perfect happiness for this world. May this desire be granted in infinite mercy, and her daily prayer be answered in behalf of her bereaved husband and two motherless daughters, that by grace divine they may enter the church militant on earth, and finally the church triumphant in heaven, to unite with her in the songs of redeeming love.

CLINTON, LA., April 11, 1874.

A HORRIBLE story of starvation and cannibalism comes from Colorado. A party of six men set out from the Ute Indian reservation for the far western territory, and after protracted absence one of them returned alone with a complaint that he had had his feet frozen and been abandoned to his fate by his companions. After closer investigation the man finally confessed under oath that one after another of these five persons had been killed by the remainder, and that he himself had killed the last remaining man only about twenty miles from the agency. He had lived on the flesh of his companions during the greater part of his absence from the reservation.

THE human race is divided into two classes: those who go ahead and do something, and those who sit still and inquire: "Why wasn't it done the other way."

JUNE.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

I gazed upon the glorious sky
And the green mountains round,
And thought, when I came to lie
Within the silent ground,
'Twere pleasant that in flowery June,
When brooks sent up a cheerful tune,
And groves a joyous sound,
The sexton's hand—my grave to make—
The rich green mountain turf should break.

A cell within the frozen mind,
A coffin borne through sleet,
And icy clods around it rolled,
While fierce the tempest beat—
Away! I will not think of these—
Blue be the sky and soft the breeze,
Earth green beneath the feet,
And be the damp mold gently pressed
Into my narrow place of rest.

There, through the long, long summer hours,
The golden light should lie,
And thick young herbs and groups of flowers
Stand in their beauty by;
The oriole should build and tell
His love-tale close beside my cell;
The idle butterfly
Should rest him there, and there he heard
The housewife bee and humming bird.

And what if cheerful shouts at noon
Come from the village sent,
Of songs of maids beneath the moon,
With fairy laughter blent?
And what if in the evening light
Betrothed lovers walk in sight
Of my low monument?
I would the lively scene around
Might know no sadder sight or sound.

I know, I know I should not see
The season's glorious show,
Nor would its brightness shine for me,
Nor its wild music flow;
But if around my place of sleep
The friends I love should come to weep,
They might not haste to go;
Soft airs and song, and light and bloom,
Should keep them lingering by my tomb.

These to their softened heart should bear
The thought of what has been,
And speak of one who cannot share
The gladness of the scene;
Whose part in all the pomp that fills
The circuit of the summer hills
Is—that his grave is green;
And gladly would their hearts rejoice
To hear again his living voice.

The Leaping Pilgrims of Echternach.

BY CHARLES E. HURD.

Among the many curious religious customs which prevail in certain parts of Europe, remnants of the decaying superstitious of past ages, none seem more curious and absurd than what is known as the leaping procession of Echternach. According to the popular tradition it was instituted to commemorate the death of St. Willibrod, an Irish missionary, and the first preacher of Christianity in the Netherlands, though why so solemn an event should be associated with so ridiculous ceremony no one has attempted to explain. It flourishes to-day as vigorously as ever.

Echternach is an ancient walled city, lying lazily among its vineyards in the valley of the Sure, famous for nothing in the world but the procession to which we have referred, and existing principally upon the spoils gathered upon that occasion from pilgrims to the shrine of the saint, and curious visitors. Just how long ago St. Willibrod existed, nobody seems definitely to know. It is sufficient, however, to know that he did exist, and that the grateful descendants of a grateful people annually commemorate his labors in the manner we have suggested. That the practice existed more than two centuries ago, we have the testimony of history. It was suppressed in 1792, but in 1808, sixteen years later, the restriction was removed, and the enthusiasm, which seemed to have been bottled up during that period, found vent in one of the most remarkable gatherings ever known before or since in that portion of Europe. Nearly thirty thousand pilgrims, men, women and children, blind, halt and lame, danced in procession to the shrine of the saint, and paid their saltatory tribute to his memory.

One might naturally imagine that the spectator of such a scene would be continually moved to laughter; but, strangely enough, such is not the case. A universal feeling of sadness and melancholy seems to prevail, and there are many instances where visitors and tourists, brought to the spot through the single feeling of curiosity, have been moved to join the procession and take solemn part in the ceremonies. Ordinarily the procession is formed on that side of the Sure opposite the shrine, so that it passes over the bridge, which is the pride and glory of the Echternachian heart. The arrivals begin at least a week before the grand occasion. First comes a swarm of tourists and curiosity-seekers, for a day or two in parties of twos and threes, and then by coach and stage loads. The railroad runs no nearer than Diekirch, about three hours' ride from Echternach, and all the available draught animals of the intermediate country are for the week in constant requisition, the owners realizing at least a hundred per cent. upon their taxable value during that brief period. Up to the morning preceding the great day, there is this intermittent sort of arrival. Then, all at once, the deluge of visitors begins. The roads leading into the town from every direction are crowded with people on foot, on horseback, in farmers' carts, family carriages, coaches, stages, and every possible and impossible kind of conveyance, eager to secure a place to witness the procession or take part in it. The camp formed by this multitude outside the town, the day and night before the celebration, presents a singular and unique spectacle. But for the all-pervading solemnity, and the total absence of anything like shows or amusements, one might imagine it to be a great fair in its preliminary stages. There is plenty of talk, a great Babel of voices; for your Fleming has a restless tongue, and would never forgive himself if any opportunity were lost for using it. In fact the occasion serves, beside its one legitimate purpose, for a grand general airing of the almost innumerable dialects of the country round about.

By the earliest streak of dawn on the morning of St. Willibrod's day both camp and town are astir, and the hum of preparation fills the air. Now the delegations begin to pour in from the nearer villages and farms, and by eight o'clock the priests commence forming the procession. This is a matter of no small difficulty. There is always a sort of solemn struggle to obtain precedence; and this, together with the fact that there is an almost entire lack of organization among the participants, generally results, after the head of the line has been arranged in due order, in letting the tail look out for itself. The column is usually formed four—sometimes five—abreast, the pilgrims keeping line by taking hands, or stretching a long stick, cane or umbrella in front of them. First in order come the priests, with a grand army of banners and church emblems, followed by a platoon of residents of Echternach, clad in white blouses, and selected for their vocal qualifications. These officiate as chanters. Then follows the crack band of the town, and behind it march, or rather dance, the long line of pilgrims, numbering anywhere from ten to fifteen thousand, and gathered from all directions within a circuit of thirty or forty miles. Treves, Saarburg, Diekirch, Bitburg, Prum, and even Luxemburg, are represented, each delegation accompanied by its band, made up of from three to forty pieces, as the case may be. The confusion which would naturally result from such a commingling of inharmonious sound is obviated by the fact that they all play the same thing, four monotonous bars, constantly repeated. The advance is made by a sort of polka step, four forward and three back, modified in time by the desire to gain ground or go slower. Sometimes, when the head of the column is retarded from any reason, the pilgrims perform a sort of waltz step in their places, for it would be considered highly disrespectful to the saint to stand still, or seize upon any such accidental advantage for the purpose of gaining a few moments' rest. The procession is brought up by a dense crowd, uncovered, repeating a monotonous chant, whose words are as old as the custom itself. The entire route to be traversed is but little over a mile, yet the time taken is generally from three to four hours.

The shrine of St. Willibrod is in the ancient church of the town, and is reached only by a long, steep flight of steps, up which the pilgrims move in the same forward and back manner; down the aisle, two by two, and around the altar, passing out at another door, at which point their mission is considered fulfilled. Some of the devotees, whose muscle and devotion hold equally well, occasionally make a circuit about the church, and again join the procession, passing around the shrine for the second time. Although during the first hour of the march many, particularly women and invalids, show evident signs of suffering and faintness, it is very rare that one is compelled to retire from the ranks. This may, in a measure, be accounted for by the fact that along the entire length of the line persons are stationed with pails of cool water, and sometimes—must it be confessed?—with beer; not for general use, but for those only who, by unmistakable signs, show their need of stimulant or refreshment.

The procession ended, the solemnity of the occasion disappears, and the remainder of the day is given up to unrestrained enjoyment, or, in other words, to the consumption of beer and tobacco. This informal portion of the day's programme is carried out with as much zeal as that of the morning. The exodus from the town begins early in the afternoon, and by nightfall the crowds which have thronged the streets of the drowsy old burg throughout the day have melted away, little by little, and quiet once more reigns supreme in Echternach for a twelvemonth.—Congregationalist.

The Bible in the Memory.

It is sometimes objected to the present method of teaching the International Sunday school lessons that they interfere with committing the Scriptures to memory. This may be the case to a degree; but we know that certain series of the expositions provide particularly for memorizing portions of each lesson. But in addition to this there should be in every Sunday school a system of memorizing important portions of the word of God, such as selections from the psalms, gospels and epistles, and from the proverbs of Solomon, the Messianic prophecies, and the rich and beautiful promises. The Sermon on the Mount, the parables of Christ, the story of Calvary, the descriptions of the heavenly world and state, are all full of endless attractions to young and old alike.

The great urgency of this kind of biblical education is increased by the anti-scriptural characteristics of the age, and by the tendencies in many churches and in much of popular religious literature to the most diluted forms of Christianity. Familiarity with the very language of the Scriptures, as a merely intellectual exercise, imparts strength to thought and vigor to style, while it gives power to principle, and fixes its ethics in the very soul of the learner. But in after years its value grows with experience. It gives its own fine aroma to character, intensifies religious feeling, and shapes the course of individual piety with unerring exactness.

Two striking instances just now occur to us. The first was that of an aged man who was plucked as a brand from the burning, and who, when disabled by disease from reading, found instruction and consolation in recalling passages of holy writ which his mother taught him when he was a child. For many years he had not entered a Christian church, and to a life of open sin had added utter neglect and bitter scorn of religion, but, when past threescore and ten, God called him at the eleventh hour again, and the Scriptures of his boyhood, the seed which his mother sowed, sprang up and ripened into that late but precious harvest.

The other case was that of a venerable lineal descendant of President Edwards, who, like Timothy, "from his youth had known the Scriptures," which made him "wise unto salvation," and wiser also than most men for "the life that now is." His familiarity with the word of God was almost an inspiration. It never failed him. Even when once giving testimony in court, upon an important trial, he so naturally and pointedly interwove his sentences with the words of the Bible that judge and counsel and jury and spectators were all amazed at his wit and wisdom. Yet there was no straining at effect in his daily conversational use of inspired language. It was the staple of his thoughts and the easy utterance of a true man, in whose heart were hidden those treasures of knowledge and wisdom.

The ready wit of the Scotch people has been largely attributed to their early familiar acquaintance with Solomon's proverbs. But the direct influence of the Bible upon religious character is in the ratio of its personal appropriation by the learner. He who is himself the word, as often insisted upon the necessity of his "words" abiding in his disciples as he did of their abiding in his word. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." There is a spirit in the very words of the Bible which transcends all mere criticism, and kindles devotion in every pious heart. But only the Holy Ghost, who breathes that spirit into them, can make them life-giving to the disciple. The history of conversion and the annals of religious experience overflow with manifestations of this quickening power of words, which before were only as other words, but which afterward, suddenly or gradually, were filled with the demonstration and power of the Holy Ghost. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth."

The beginning of the new quarter of the International lessons, on the gospel of Mark, will offer an excellent opportunity for teachers and scholars to commit portions of these intensely interesting and vivid passages to memory. If teachers will set the example, their pupils will more readily follow. It is high time for a genuine reform in this matter. The standard of Sunday school instruction will not reach its right height until the word of God has its proper place in the memory and in the conscience. There is deep wisdom in the old phrase of our school-days: "Getting the lesson by heart." That is next to getting it into the heart.—Christian Intelligencer.

Summer Breakfasts.

We are going to have, unless all tokens lie, a royal summer. But its quality will depend very much on how we breakfast. The sun rises early enough to give us ample time, and his golden help besides. Set your breakfast-table where it will invite his shimmering gleam to dance upon the wall. A northern or western room is too chill and gloomy. Our sunny days are precious, and most so in the morning, when the day is new and the hours are freshest. Sleep has invigorated us. Editors excepted, we went to bed early, and have no valid excuse for not getting up rosy and cheerful. Emerson says that it was said of Lord Holland that he always came down to breakfast with the air of a man who had just met with some signal good fortune. Though he must sometimes have been a hypocrite, we commend him for a saint. Don't leave out the golden sky from your breakfast picture. Sit where you can see the green tips brushed by the golden pencil of the sun.

But not to be looking out of the window too absent-mindedly, why should not the table-cloth be clean and white, and put on square and smooth? And why, in the name of self-respect, shouldn't the China be good enough, every day, for company? We will say just here that we are not moralizing for the upper ten, nor sketching any aristocratic breakfast-table. The fact is that few of us, rich or poor, make the most of what we have, or might have just as well as not. Toiling after the coming fortune and imaginary enjoyment, we overlook the present, and the thousand helps to daily happiness right about us. Our plea is for more of the cheap elegancies of life that might so easily be universal gifts.

To come back to breakfast. Why not, while we are about it, have good, hot, fragrant tea, instead of the watery, half-transparent, grayish, herby, bitter beverage; good coffee, instead of the restaurant, chicorized, lukewarm, nauseating, Laodicean article? Why not have good bread, or, if that be beyond the present stage of American civilization, toasted bread? And why not good butter? We beg leave to insist on these questions, because they are morally important. It is of great social and spiritual moment that we do not quarrel with our bread and butter, particularly at breakfast. A great deal of wretched character and dyspeptic piety come of sour bread and heavy griddle-cakes. We infer that Lord Holland, to come down in that way to breakfast, must have generally had a good one when he got at it. To say "good morning," without hypocrisy, one should have a fair prospect of a good breakfast. We appreciate the Scripture blessing given to Jael: "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be; he asked water and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish." She knew how to put things on the table.

Of course flowers cannot be dispensed with on such a table, nor, as the season advances, the summer fruits. What so suitable as flowers, gathered out of the crisp and dewy air, to help express and satisfy our morning sentiments? They are the smiles of good-natured nature, answering back to the welcome in our hearts. Let us invite within their bewitching fragrance and their fair colors. "And because," as Lord Bacon says, "the breath of flowers is far sweeter in the air (where it comes and goes, like the warbling of music) than in the hand, therefore nothing is more fit for that delight than to know what be the flowers and plants that do best perfume the air." It was Lord Bacon's own custom always to have the flowers of the season on his table. And if not flowers, let us have leaves, tree-blossoms, sprigs of ivy or sweet-brier, the oak twig with its acorn tassels, the green tips of hemlocks, grape-blossoms, or the glistening leaves of laurel.

What a preparation is such a summer breakfast for him "who goeth forth to his labor until the evening," and what a satisfaction for his Aurora, goddess of the morning, dewy-breathed and rosy-fingered, who presides over the domestic day! We think she looks well behind the coffee-urn in a white apron and French calico.—Springfield Republican.

The London Lions.

It must be admitted that your lion in a menagerie is exposed to great indignities. Though the proverb has it that a cat may look at a king, it does not follow that the king, especially when he is in difficulties, likes to look at the cat. The caged monarch of the wilderness seems to know what is said of him by the little boys who have come in at half price, and it must be irritating, especially if he thinks how good they would have tasted at a banquet in his Lybian home. Unquestionably the lion, considering that all his courage and nobility are a fraud, has been a much overworked animal. In heraldry alone, if we regard him only in the rampant state, his services have been prodigious, whatever assistance he may have derived from the unicorns and griffins. Of his ligure in fables, from Æsop to La Fontaine, it would be a waste of space to speak, as well as of his variegated colors, blue and red, upon the sign-boards. Of his domestication in Britain all the world knows, and how, since great wars have become obsolete, he has engaged in cotton-spinning, like Hercules at the distaff. And this brings us at last to our topic. Everybody who has been in London has seen Landseer's monumental lions in Trafalgar square. Albeit of the brazen variety, always heretofore supposed to be uncommonly hard (*vid. Hor. Car. III * * ) it seems that these metallic beasts are gradually wasting under the corrosive action of the London rain—a tabes into which Dr. Percy has been commissioned to inquire. Would it not be dreadful if the doctor should report it necessary to furnish each of the poor lions with a great coat and an umbrella? The latter article a lion upon his hind legs might manage to handle, but what is he to do with it standing upon his four feet? Nor would it be in keeping to provide him with a brass Yellowplush to hold the article over him. So much for bringing lions from a natal place, where it only rains once a year, to a land of exile, where it rains every day in the year, and generally all day! Black marble halls of an Egyptian cast would surely have been better. Sir Thomas Browne, in his "Vulgar Errors," is very philosophical upon the fact that the Egyptians adorned their waterspouts with the heads of lions; but it is one thing to have the water running from your mouth and another to have it cascading down your ribs and wearing there abnormal channels.

Sundry newspaper correspondents, however, have come to the defense of the London drench as a consumer of lions. One writer in the Pall Mall Gazette attributes the leonine decay to the political, temperance and other mass meetings held in the square. And here the indignity of the poor beast becomes more notably painful; for this writer says that the liveliest sympathizers are those who select the backs of the lions as a proper place to sympathize from and on. All the seats, he says, on the Northwestern lion, upon a recent occasion, were taken, and he adds that "his back was occupied by a band of youths who vigorously expressed approval with their heels upon his bronze ribs." Three street Arabs were perched upon his very head or mane, and at this insult, albeit of sounding brass, he could not even roar. Other boys did irreverently climb up and slide down the hind quarters of the animal, and with their boots, garnished with iron heels and nails, did scratch his unresisting sides. This was clearly more damaging to the lion than millions of feet of rain-water—he suffered greater abrasions in this way than if he had been exposed for forty days and nights when the windows of heaven were opened. If such treatment is to go on, it is well suggested that the hind quarters of the Trafalgar lions "will soon be as smooth as the bronze toe of St. Peter at Rome."

Alas! if we must moralize a little after our zoological fable, the readiest thing to suggest is that the two-legged lions of society wear out much faster than their graven lunges in London. When a great man satisfies the children of the world to make a familiar play-ground of his head and shoulders, to fawn upon him and caress him, and even affectionately to embrace him, he will certainly get shabby at last, and be a second-hand lion, only fit for the pawn shops in the back slums of literature or science, of politics or art. There is a kind of familiarity in such honors which is apt to end in contempt. The shoulders of a very great man may be broad and stout, but he ought to be careful how he suffers the fawning parasite to perch upon them. Notoriety is the most ticklish of possessions, and there is no sadder spectacle than a social lion grown shabby.—New York Tribune.

TRUE PRAYER.—To present a petition is one thing; to prosecute a suit is another. Most prayers answer to the former; but successful prayer corresponds to the latter. God's people frequently lodge their petition in the court of heaven, and there they let it lie. They do not press their suit. They do not employ other means of furthering it beyond the presenting of it. The whole of prayer does not consist in taking hold of God. The main matter is holding on. How many are induced by the slightest appearance of repulse to let go, as Jacob did not! I have been struck with the manner in which petitions are usually concluded: "And your petitioners will ever pray." So "men ought always pray (to God) and never faint." Paysen says: "The promise of God is not to the net, but to the habit of prayer."—Nevins.

Religious Intelligence.

NINE new Presbyterian churches have been organized within the bounds of the Synod of the Pacific since its last meeting.

MISS COLLINS, a missionary among the California Indians, counts up eight hundred converts among the various tribes from her ministrations.

A MOVE is on foot in the several branches of the Lutheran body to unite on some common basis. The Lutheran Observer thinks such union is only possible on the basis of the Augsburg confession.

RABBI SONNESCHEIN, of Cincinnati, has written a letter opposing the movement to substitute the Christian for the Jewish Sabbath. He says the Jews don't want a forgery so long as they can have the true coin.

A NEW Roman Catholic college is about to be built in Trenton, New Jersey, by the Franciscan fathers. It is intended to accommodate 100 students, and will be the headquarters of the fathers in New Jersey.

THANK-OFFERINGS.—The British and Foreign Bible Society and the Church Missionary Society have each received a donation of $25,000, from an anonymous donor, as a "thank-offering for special mercies."

THE latest infidel movement we have noted is the statement that ground has been taken up for the Paine Memorial Hall in Boston, intended as a center of infidel influences and a monument to the memory of Thomas Paine.

THE foundation-stone of a new Roman Catholic church, to cost $140,000, was laid on Sunday, June 7, in Hoboken, New Jersey, in the presence of an immense multitude. Upward of 5,000 men from various Catholic societies marched in procession.

THE Missionary Herald reports the organization of a Sunday school at Kobe, Japan, December 7, 1873, which is said to be the first Sabbath school conducted in the Japanese language in the empire. It consists of about forty scholars, of all ages from five to fifty.

LAST YEAR the Baptist Home Mission Society expended $18,500 for benevolent purposes. The North and South are reported as working together harmoniously. The work among the freedmen is reported to be in a most encouraging and satisfactory condition.

DEAN STANLEY recently took a prominent part in the dedication of Rev. Dr. Porter's City Temple, a dissenting place of worship in London. In his address he alluded to the difficulties in the way of fraternization, but expressed himself in favor of the most friendly and kindly intercourse with members of other communions.

WHILE in London, a few days ago, the Czar was waited upon by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York at Buckingham Palace, where the primate presented to him a Bible in Russ; translated under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Dean Stanley was present at the interview.

HENRY MARTYN once said: "Truly, if I ever see a Hindoo a real believer in Jesus I shall see something more nearly approaching to the resurrection of a dead body than anything I have yet seen." Now there are more than 200 pastors laboring in native congregations in India, and a considerable number of these are converted Brahmins.

THE Baptists have opened a new out station at Thay-Bao, near Thoogzal, in Burmah. The preacher is a former Buddhist priest. At this place, where water was once refused the missionaries, the people have given their monastery for a chapel and school, and the necessary water-tanks, so that the outlay from the mission treasury has only been $4.

THE United Presbyterian Synod, at their recent meeting in Edinburg, unanimously agreed to memorialize the government to disestablish and disendow the churches of England and Scotland, and to petition against all legislative proposals in reference to patronage in the Church of Scotland, except as a part of a final measure for the disestablishment and disendowment of that church.

THE new Sunday school hall of Dr. Scudder's church, New York, is said to have cost $40,000, exclusive of the ground upon which it is erected. The Independent says: "A sign of the growing interest in the religious training of the young is seen in the increased attention to Sunday school architecture. A basement or gallery is no longer counted the place for a first-class Sunday school."

THE American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions makes an earnest appeal to its friends for increased support, to meet its current expenses for the year. The receipts during the past eight months, including $19,220 for the work in papal lands, have been $260,306, and $258,000 will be needed during the next four months to enable the society to close its year without debt.

THE Roman Catholic pilgrims from the United States arrived in Paris on Thursday, May 28, and were received by the Archbishop of Paris, who delivered an allocution, and gave them his blessing. They afterward visited the shrines at Lourdes and Paray-le-Monial and Rome, receiving at the latter place the blessing of his holiness, and were permitted to kiss his hands. On June 12 the pilgrims tendered the Pope $100,000 in cash, besides giving him a well-filled bag of American gold nuggets.

SEVERAL errors have occurred in recent notes upon missions in Japan. There are, as far as we know, ten Protestant societies at work in that empire, not twelve—the most recent being the United Presbyterian Scotch mission, not the Church Missionary Society, which is simply opening a new station at Yeddo, after previous labors at Nagasaki and Osaka. Furthermore, the theological class at Yokohama is not specially under Reformed patronage, but is, we are glad to hear, a union effort among several of the churches.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Interior writes that within the past eighteen months over 600 of the Nez Perces Indians in Idaho have been received into the church of Christ, and that of the Spokans tribe living north of Kamia 253 adults and 81 children have been also received. There are now as the fruits of preaching the gospel of Christ, deducting deaths and excommunications, and including 12 of the native Nez Perces church of former years, 920 native converts among Nez Perces and Spokans.

THE annual parade of the Brooklyn Sunday school children took place on Wednesday, May 27. About 40,000 children, in holiday dress, paraded. The city was divided into eight districts and the children into eight divisions, each provided with marshals and aids. Before the parade the children were gathered in large churches and sang their anniversary songs; and later in the afternoon each school assembled in its own building, and children and teachers were regaled with cake, fruit and ice cream. The day passed over without accident.

AT THE session of the Reformed Presbyterian Synod in Philadelphia the report of a committee recommending the use of unfermented wine in the celebration of the Lord's Supper by all congregations was laid on the table for the present. The committee on Grangers unequivocally condemn this and all other secret orders "as ensnaring, deceptive and sinful in themselves, as prejudicial to the best interests of society, and as a lawless and inefficient way of obtaining the redress of grievances," and recommend that the synod enjoin it upon all sessions not to fellowship members of this or any other secret order. The report was unanimously adopted.

THE India Evangelical Review for January speaks thus of the Santhal mission (the Santhals are an aboriginal tribe in Bengal:) "Few Indian missions can point to results so great, attained in so brief a time, as the Indian Home Mission to the Santhals. It is superintended by a managing committee in this country, and depends for its support on the Christian community of India. Most of the converts deem it not only a duty but a delight to make known that Savior on whom they themselves have believed. Most of those recently baptized, as well as many inquirers now waiting for baptism, are the fruits of the labors put forth spontaneously by the converts themselves. The report mentions the addition of 220 Santhals to the church during 1872. Many more have been added since the close of that year."

THE Moravian mission station at Kyelang, in the West Himalaya range, on the borders of Thibet, is full two miles above the level of the sea. Here, after many years of labor, the missionaries have gathered in a few converts out of a Buddhist population. As Kyelang is a stopping-place for caravans from Thibet and other countries in Central Asia, the gospel can often be preached to passing traders. Recently a Mohammedan has expressed a desire to become a Christian, and a Thibetan lama, after the reading of one of the gospels and discussion upon it in the monastery to which he belonged, has resolved upon the same course. Thibet is still closed against the missionaries; but they visit the villages on the frontiers, preach the gospel and distribute books and medicines. The mission grounds at Kyelang have been connected by an aqueduct with a neighboring glacier. The only orchard in the whole country is located upon them. The people are beginning to imitate the missionaries in cultivating gardens, so that this station is growing to be an oasis in the wilderness.

BRAHMINISM.—Max Muller, in his late lecture on missions, says of Brahminism: "That religion (Brahminism) is still professed by at least 110,000,000 of human souls, and, to judge from the last census, even that enormous number falls much short of the real truth. And yet I do not shrink from saying that their religion is dying or dead. And why? Because it cannot stand the light of day. The worship of Siva, of Vishnu and the other popular deities is of the same, nay, in many cases of a more degraded and savage character than the worship of Jupiter, Apollo and Minerva; it belongs to a stratum of thought which is long buried beneath our feet. It may live on, like the lion and the tiger, but the mere air of free thought and civilized life will extinguish it. A religion may linger on for a long time; it may be accepted by the large masses of the people, because it is there, and there is nothing better. But when a religion has ceased to produce defenders of the faith, prophets, champions and martyrs, it has ceased to live; and in this sense Brahminism has ceased to live for more than a thousand years."

THE Presbyterian General Assembly adjourned June 3, to meet next year at Cleveland, Ohio. The principal matter before it, as heretofore stated, was the question of consolidating the various boards of the church. A long and very able discussion was provoked before the final votes were taken. The consolidationists carried their measures, for the most part, the important one gained being the union of the sustentation scheme, home missions proper and the freedmen into one bureau, to be known as the "Home Mission Board." The board of publication will remain as it is. By this rearrangement the machinery of the church societies is simplified without being weakened. Reports on the Board of Foreign Missions showed that it was out of debt. The adopted report on ruling elders that any church, by a vote of the members in special communion, may elect such elders for a limited time, provided that it be not less than three years, and the session be made to consist of three classes, one of which only shall be elected every year; and provided that elders once ordained shall not be divested of office, though they are not elected. Upon the statement being made that the Home Mission Board was $78,000 in debt, a collection was taken up in the Assembly, and $40,000 subscribed by the representatives of the several presbyteries.—Christian Union.

A Struggler.

Over this signature a young man writes to us for advice. He says:

How are young men who love their church, and who love to work, and who can farm, but have not the means—how are such men to procure this work? Young men who can barely keep themselves and families from starving—and there are a great many of these tho way times are now—have one of three things to do: Go back to the world and take work that they would not dare to do and conscientiously claim to be religious, fall back upon the poor fund, or starve. Now I know there are a great many members of our church—if not here, elsewhere—who have a great deal of idle land, and could fit up farms for such young men, allowing them to pay, with interest, so much every year, thereby giving them a chance to work for and earn a home, and also benefiting the donor.

The writer is evidently religious, a member of some church, and tempted by the straitness of the times to accept employment not consistent with his views of Christian obligation. The poor fund, whatever that may be, we imagine, would not amount to much if he were to seek assistance in that direction, and starving is only to be accepted when all honest effort fails. To violate his Christian conscience and to sacrifice his religion for bread are things to be rejected without hesitation. The solicitation may be strong, the way to an honest livelihood may be precarious in the extreme, but God, in his providence, is surely not indifferent to those who have a mind to work, and who hold firmly to their religious principles.

In these times, when all branches of business are depressed, and when there is little demand for mechanics, clerks and professional men, it would seem that the one thing to do is that which "A Struggler" suggests—the cultivation of the soil. The difficulty, in part at least, is to get a start. With some capital a young man might look about and rent land, stock it, and go to work. At this point the real trouble begins. A few hundred dollars are needed, and in these days borrowing without security is next to impossible. In rare instances merchants might venture something with a lien on the prospective crop, but practically this expedient is scarcely to be considered. The merchants are careful about advancing, even where there is land, stock and experienced managers to assure the result. Well-to-do planters who have open land, good improvements, and some money and credit, could perhaps set up young men. But this class of planters is very small indeed. The most are themselves in debt, struggling with embarrassment, and not able to help themselves. Where they have the means, it looks altogether feasible, and the best policy for all concerned is to divide large plantations into small farms, to erect cottages on them, and lease or sell to industrious and capable occupants, who will make valuable citizens and members of society. This plan has been discussed, and in some instances adopted, we believe, but not much has come of it as yet.

Very few planters can afford the expense, and those who can are uncertain of the result. We should be glad to see our large landholders interest themselves more in this subject, and fit up small farms, and invite tenants or purchasers, but there is at present uncertainty and risk, and it will be a system slow of general adoption. If our young men wait for farms to be fixed up for them they will wait a long time. It is a cold, calculating business world, and the man who has nothing but his own muscle will only be paid for the work he can do. He must take a ground start, and make his own way, without expecting favors of any sort. If he has the strength and endurance to plow, to keep up his row in the field, and to be worth the wages of a laborer, he can get employment. If he has physical stamina combined with intelligence and good character, he may, by economical management, have a cabin and a patch of his own, and after awhile a comfortable home. Thousands of young men in the South are cultivating the soil, working themselves in the field, and making a living. Some of them are prospering.

But the obstacles under our present condition, social and political, are many. To young men raised in the city it would prove a hard and trying life, and in many cases the struggle would be given up in despair. It is better, however, to make the effort, and, if properly directed and persevered in, ultimate success may crown the endeavor. Our young men must make their own start, they must help themselves. They must make up their minds to work hard and to suffer much. A man who takes his pack on his shoulder and goes out into the country, in the planting regions, can obtain employment, but the pay would be perhaps fifteen dollars a month, with bacon and meal for rations, and the labor severe to one not accustomed to it. Openings of a better sort would come after awhile, land could be rented, and the means afforded of working on better conditions.

What young men and men with families are to do it is most difficult to tell. Unless the skies brighten they must get away if they can; but if things grow worse, and they cannot get away, what then? "A Struggler" doubtless represents a large class of young men who know not what to do. And there are yet other classes of strugglers more pitiable, because advanced in life and with families to support. Things may grow better after awhile, but for these two or three Africanized States, and especially for New Orleans and Louisiana, immediate relief is scarcely to be hoped for. The political and commercial horizons are almost equally dark. Light may break from some quarter, but it is safe to plan and to act with reference to a prolonged prostration of the material interests of the country. It is well to hope for more prosperous times, but it may be the height of folly to wait for them.

Returning Reason.

We have always hoped that after the passions, prejudices and misconceptions immediately following the war should have time to abate, the more honest and intelligent people of the North would take a fair and just view of affairs in the South. That this return to reason should be slow is what we might expect. They were for years in no temper to hear the truth, even when it could be laid before them. Their sources of information, however, were mostly from political adventurers and religious fanatics, who were incapable of a truthful and unbiased utterance. Better and more competent observers have investigated the condition of our country, and have made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the character of our people and the wrongs to which they have been subjected. Gradually the light is breaking, and the real character of Southern reconstruction is beginning to be understood.

Scribner's Monthly for July contains a brief editorial on the Southern States. In reference to the policy of the Federal government in its treatment of the Southern States, and the fruits of that policy, it says:

Has the government a policy in its treatment of the reconstructed States? Has it had a policy since the close of the war? If it has one, and has had one, is it not about time it were changed? If the present condition of these States is in any respect the fruit of that policy, have we not had enough of it? Men of common sense and common honesty learn by experience, and try to realize in practice what they learn.

The Confederate States, or those which called themselves such during the civil war, have passed through a political, social and industrial revolution. They were left at the close of the war utterly poor, with their industrial forces and machinery destroyed, with a new political element to be assimilated or amalgamated, their political institutions to be reconstructed, and their old political relations to the Union to be renewed. They needed, in this tremendous emergency, the wisest and most considerate treatment. We have nothing to do with the question whether they had sinned and deserved punishment. We are not called upon to decide whether, in the great disasters and trials that have followed the war, they have received only a just retribution. We claimed that they belonged to the Union. We fought for the Union and the re-establishment of the old relations; and the moment the military power of the Confederacy was crushed it was the business of our government, in the kindest, firmest, most sympathetic and most generous way, to reclaim their affectionate loyalty. Has the government done it? Has it tried to do it? South Carolina, Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas have an answer to the question, which is pretty well known throughout the Union.

In some of the Southern States a condition approaching absolute anarchy exists. Carpet-baggers, leading a host of black and ignorant men, are, in two or three of these, pitted against the resident whites, on whose intelligence and loyalty the future welfare of those States depends. In others a rebellion against this state of things has taken place, which drives two-thirds of the black vote from the polls. Taxes are heavy, and are too often absorbed by the corrupt schemes of politicians. Men are not only discouraged, but are full of the bitterness that comes from oppression. They feel that they are wronged, that they have no future, that they cannot protect themselves, that the general government does not and will not protect them, and that nothing but death or voluntary exile will give them relief.

Dr. Holland knows very well that the government has a policy—a policy of political expediency, with no regard to justice or the best interests of the reconstructed States. There is a mixture, in this article, of truth and error, and perhaps an honest perplexity and unavoidable confusion in the mind of the writer. Certainly there is no extreme of friendliness to the South, and no leaning to those constitutional principles which were once sacred to the great majority of the American people. Touching the remedy for the intolerable evils under which certain of the reconstructed States are laboring, we have this paragraph:

To say that the national government cannot constitutionally help this state of things is to acknowledge that the doctrine of States rights, in whose name and by whose authority the Southern States strove to throw off the national rule, is a sound one. The national government can help it, and ought to have helped it long ago. By the authority of a constitution which guarantees a republican form of government to every State, it could have protected the ballot-boxes of every State, and prevented a mob from usurping that form of government. A mob is not a republican form of government. No government is republican, even in its form, whose ballot-box is not accessible to every voter, and is not preserved inviolable from all corruption. No government is republican, even in form, that is controlled by mercenary aliens. There are half a dozen States whose governments have ceased to be republican, even in form, when we come down to anything like a strict definition of the phrase. And these States, or some of them, have appealed to the President again and again for help to decide the questions which their conflicts have involved, and appealed in vain. Why any policy that would involve a decision would be better than none. Are these States to be left forever to internecine strifes? Give them a military government until they are ready to govern themselves harmoniously. They would thrive and be happy under such a government, because they would be protected. They can have no prosperity until they are politically at rest. Does any one doubt, in the light which the present state of things throws upon the question, that military government, in half a dozen States that might be mentioned, would have saved those States from untold miseries, and advanced them incalculably further toward a sound reconstruction than they stand to-day? Is our national government nothing? Is our Union without civil power? If it cannot control these State strifes, that in one State, at least, have gone on to bloodshed, we are at a loss to know of what particular use it is, and we cannot blame the people of the South for regarding it with a sentiment more bitter than contempt.

The reference to the constitutional scruples of the government, after what has occurred in Louisiana, must be intended for irony, we should suppose, were it not for the fact that the writer proceeds in a deliberate way to argue the right to intervene, and to scout the idea of States rights as held by the fathers of the republic. Happily for those States, the President declined to interfere in the quarrels in Texas and Arkansas, and the elde of right and law was permitted to triumph. The two or three States that have been turned over to negro voters and unprincipled white leaders would, no doubt, be much better off if they were placed under military government. A qualified suffrage, by which the intelligence and property of the country should have a controlling influence in the management of State affairs, is the other alternative. Why does not Dr. Holland come out fully and explicitly, and recognize the fact that negro suffrage unqualified, and an unscrupulous partisan administration at Washington, are the cause of our lamentable condition here in the South? He does approach this conclusion when he speaks of "carpet-baggers leading a host of black and ignorant men," and that these "are pitted against the resident whites, on whose intelligence and loyalty the future welfare of those States depends." The national government doubtless can help this state of things, for it has brought it about. Either change the suffrage laws, or give us an out-and-out military government, or stand aloof altogether and let the States settle their own affairs. While not altogether satisfied with this deliverance from the tripod of one of the most able and popular Northern magazines, it is an augury of good. It indicates returning reason, and that truth is beginning to prevail. The lies and slanders which have been so long in the ascendant are giving way. The light is breaking.

Protest Against Fraternity.

It will be remembered that the Southern Presbyterian General Assembly, after much discussion, appointed a committee of conference to discuss the question of closer and more fraternal relations with a similar committee appointed by the Northern General Assembly.

The minority opposed to this action, composed of some of the strongest and most influential members of the Assembly, presented an elaborate protest against the appointment of the committee of conference, which was spread upon the record without answer. The protest is an able document, and one which does honor to its authors and signers. We have not space for the entire paper. The following opening paragraphs will put our readers in possession of the question at issue:

We make this protest because we judge this action to be contrary to the principles with which we are historically identified as a church of the Lord Jesus Christ, which principles we hold to have been correctly stated in a paper on this same subject, adopted by the General Assembly at Louisville in 1870.

Our relations with the Northern Church are determined by their adoption, in 1861, of what are commonly known as "the Spring resolutions," the principles contained in which have been reaffirmed, indorsed and elaborated by them in all their subsequent legislation, and have never been withdrawn nor rescinded by them. By said action, to use the language of the protest offered on that occasion, and signed by the moderator of that Assembly himself, and by many others, "in deciding a political question, and in making that decision practically a condition of membership to the church, the Assembly, in our judgment, violated the constitution of the church, and usurped the prerogative of its divine Master." Under said action the presbyterics originally composing this body felt themselves extruded from the communion of that Assembly. And the organization of the Southern Church stands, and has stood since that time, as a living testimony for the supremacy of Christ as Lord of the conscience, and for the spirituality of his kingdom—principles dishonored by them in us. Nor can we consistently blunt the edge of our testimony for these principles by any official correspondence, which would change our attitude of protest, while that brand of dishonor remains.

Their overture, adopted in 1873, and sent us by the Northern Assembly, affords no sufficient reason for the course pursued by this Assembly. We are painfully convinced that their overture evades the very questions it pretends to meet.

It assures us that both bodies composing their Assembly unanimously adopted a resolution making "null and void, and of no binding effect, all action touching their brethren adhering to the Southern Assembly or to the Old School Synod of Missouri:"

Whereas both bodies referred to have lately adopted and made part of their record a paper which indorses in the most solemn, formal and unequivocal manner, and which sets forth and maintains the very principles against which we have protested, and do now protest, to wit: the decision of a civil court in the case of the Walnut Street church, Louisville, Kentucky.

See Digest, printed by order of the General Assembly, Minutes, 1873.

Their overture professes to express confidence in our "soundness of doctrine and Christian character:"

Whereas the abusive and slanderous charges made against our ministers and church, publicly and continuously reiterated — touching not only our doctrine and character, but even our motives—are not only not formally retracted, but are actually, by implication, at least, repeated and reaffirmed in the paper just referred to, and very recently made part of their record.

The protest concludes with the following:

To appoint a committee of conference in present circumstances is, we fear, calculated to place us in a false position before the Christian world. It is a well-known fact that our beloved church is historically identified with testimony for the supremacy of God alone as Lord of the conscience, and for the spirituality of his church. It is well known that the duty to testify for these fundamental principles has been in the providence of God specially bound upon us by the very action of the Northern Assembly; and that since the enactment of the "Spring resolutions," in 1861, we have borne our testimony in protest against the continuous legislation of the Northern Assembly, by which these principles have been in us dishonored. It is as well known that the Northern Assembly is historically identified with a system of proscriptive legislation, by which, in the judgment of many, the good name of Christ and of his church has been dishonored; and that, moreover, they have never rescinded such legislation, and that they still maintain the principles on which it is founded. Should we, therefore, in such circumstances as these, consent now to enter into a conference which, for the very reasons above stated, we have hitherto steadily refused, it immediately gives rise to the opinion that we have receded from our testimony. Changing our attitude toward that body, while they have made no adequate corresponding change in their real attitude toward us, will give rise to the opinion that we have consented to suppress our testimony to these principles, and that in suppressing our own testimony we are practically admitting the truthfulness of theirs. By this action, as it appears to us, the Assembly runs great risk of casting suspicion upon the glorious record of the past history, and upon the present attitude of our beloved church.

We feel constrained, therefore, to protest against this action of the Assembly, because it contravenes the duty we owe to the precious principles which were intrusted to us, to maintain and to defend; because the reasons proposed in the overture of the Northern Assembly are not sufficient to justify any change in our relations to that body; because it tends to misrepresent the real position of our beloved church before the world; and because it tends to promote doubt, agitation and discord among our people.

Inasmuch as the facts and principles on which this protest is founded cannot be denied, we can but express the earnest hope and confidence that the Holy Spirit may so attend and guide our representatives in the projected conference that these things be neither overlooked nor set aside.

The Church and Temperance.

Last week we had something to say about liquor-dealing. We have since met with an excellent editorial in the Western Methodist on The Church and Temperance. We give the most of the article. It meets our views throughout. The Western says:

It must be confessed, however, that the General Rules in this respect, as well as in others, have not been faithfully observed by all our members, nor have they been faithfully enforced by all our preachers. It is too true that there are Methodists who make intoxicating liquors which they do not doubt will be used as a beverage—there are those who buy and those who sell, and those who use as a beverage intoxicating liquors. While but few, if any, are engaged in the manufacture and traffic on a small scale, the retail business being disreputable in the highest degree, too many there are who are engaged in the wholesale business. Unfortunately the traffic in intoxicating liquors in this country has been almost universally associated with the grocery business, and on this account Methodists, as well as members of other churches, have been led into this great evil, appeasing conscience by reasoning which is sophistical and altogether unsatisfactory to the enlightened understanding. Thus men who in all other respects are meritorious and even exemplary are to-day engaged in a traffic which is ruinous to their souls, and to the souls as well as the bodies and estates of their fellow-men, and which brings shame and reproach upon the church. The General Rules, if carried out in their letter and spirit, we have always believed to be sufficient for the extirpation of this great evil in the church.

But the General Conference, recently in session, concluded that it was necessary to have a specific rule. It was resolved by a two-thirds majority to strike out: "Drunkenness or drinking spirituous liquors, unless in cases of necessity;" and to insert: "Making, buying, selling or using, as a beverage, intoxicating liquors." This change, before it can take effect, must be concurred in by three-fourths of all the members of the Annual Conferences; to them it will be submitted at their next sessions.

The important question now is: Ought this change to be concurred in by the Annual Conferences?

We are free to say that we have not been in favor of any change of the General Rules on this subject—or any other. The chief reason why we have opposed changes is because every specification that is added to the present number weakens the moral force of the General Rules as such, and makes them less efficient in their operation against evils which are not specified and cannot be, because they are multitudinous and ever varying in their forms. It would not require a large addition of specific rules to destroy the General Rules.

We are free to say further that we do not approve the language of the specific rule adopted by the General Conference. It is susceptible of misconstruction and abuse—some might be harassed without deserving it, and others might escape when guilty, under the peculiar verbiage of the rule. But this is a small matter comparatively, and perhaps it is impossible to frame a rule that could not be criticised by those who do not wish to be restrained from the evil.

Having made these explanations, we are now ready to say that we hope the Annual Conferences will concur in the action of the General Conference. We hope so because we think that a failure would cause greater evils than any which are likely to result from the proposed change, because also we anticipate that the specific rule, if concurred in generally, will aid somewhat in the reformation of the church, not only on this one point of moral discipline, but on many others of great importance.

We have no compromise to offer with any class in or out of the church who favor dram-drinking or liquor-making or liquor-dealing. They are all inseparably associated with drunkenness, which is the sin and scourge of the nineteenth century. A Methodist who is guilty of this sin, either as a principal or an accessory, if he will not reform ought to leave the church or be expelled from it, after all proper appliances have been used for his salvation. Let mild means be first used. Let him be instructed, persuaded and warned, pray with him, be pitiful and kind toward him. But if need be reprove and rebuke, and then at last expel him.

Rules, whether general or specific, will not avail anything that is good unless they are put in force. The General Rules, as they are now, require pastors to execute discipline against dram-drinkers, liquor-sellers and liquor-makers; this specific rule, if introduced, will not make this duty more binding upon pastors, but will simply explain to them and to all the members what is already meant by the General Rules. The explanation will be valuable only to the extent that it contributes to the wise and faithful administration of discipline.

Letter from China.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, May 9, 1874.

MR. EDITOR: I have just returned from a preaching tour in the interior, one hundred and fifty miles from Shanghai. I was gone about thirteen days, and, though about half the time not at all well, was able to preach to hundreds. Many came and bought our books, and would tell us that missionaries had never been there before. There are Roman Catholics in that part of the country, but they never distribute the word of God or preach on the street. At Woosit, a large walled city, we halted a day, and preached to thousands who were pleasure-seeking upon the mountain near the city, which is a place of great resort for idolatrous worshipers at certain seasons of the year. I was not aware, until we had reached the place, that there was to be an idolatrous procession. I took my arm full of books, and our two native helpers having done the same, we started for the hill and the temples where the people seemed to be assembling. After we had preached we sold them a number of books. Some Roman Catholics were around, but they were very shy of us. I was grieved to see that the great mass of these idolatrous worshipers were old women, just about to pass over the river of death. If we made an attempt to say anything to them they would almost invariably say: "Giar, giar, O me to feh." "Thanks, thanks, Omidah Buddah." We then went to the rue of the many tea shops, where hundreds had collected to see and hear something new, but I was suffering so much from my cold that I could scarcely keep from leaning my head upon the table, and found it prudent to return to the boat.

In the afternoon thousands came in front of and following two or three chairs borne by eight or ten men. I took my seat in a chair by the side of the road, with a small table in front of me, and books upon it, to sell to those who passed by us. I was curious to see what was in the chairs borne by so many strong men, followed by such dense crowds, and to my astonishment I found a small, insignificant little mud idol, not more than about twelve inches in height. There were two or three chairs, and in each was one of these small idols. Gongs, great heavy gongs, were swung to the fleshy part of the arm of about twenty strong men, by means of hooks of iron which pierced the flesh. Every few minutes they would with the left hand strike the gong with a heavy blow. By doing this they are supposed to please the idol, and by it gain merit. O the blindness of the heathen who fall down to these idols of wood and stone, the works of their own hands! The Roman Catholic churches in China are filled with images, and the people fall down and do homage to them, just as the heathen do.

But I must hasten on from this scene to one which occurred in Shanghai just before I reached home. It occurred on Sunday, May 3. I was then in Soochow, and knew nothing of any disturbance in Shanghai until within a few miles of this place. Not being here at the time, I will not attempt to describe it. My family had to leave home for a place of safety, leaving several gentlemen in the house, for it was reported that the whole of the property in the French concession would be burned by the mob. I send you the papers, that you may see the full account. We feel truly thankful to God for his preserving care. He has been to us as a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, and to all those who trust in him he is continually saying: "Fear not, for I am with thee." That the Lord may bless his work in China and everywhere, and watch over his people for good, is the sincere prayer of your brother in Christ,

J. W. LAMBUTH.

BISHOP KEENER reached home on Friday, the twenty-sixth of June, after an absence of more than two months. To-day he leaves, in company with Bishop Marvin and Dr. Tudor, for Jackson, Louisiana, to attend the commencement exercises of Centenary College. Bishop Marvin delivers the annual sermon, Dr. Tudor the literary address. Sorry that we cannot go along with so much good company, and with such a feast of fat things in prospect. We hope, however, to have an account of the occasion in due time.

REV. DR. W. H. WATKINS gave us a call last week on his way to Brookhaven, whither he went to preach the annual sermon at the commencement of Whitworth Female College.

Civil Rights and Uncivil Wrongs.

The Christian at Work is more outspoken than any of the Northern religious papers against the civil rights bill. A year or two in Louisiana would confirm Dr. Talmage in his convictions, and carry him somewhat further in the denunciation of this radical measure. We quote as follows:

This civil rights bill, now before Congress, is as impolitic as it is unjust and unwarranted. Further, if it be not hypercriticism to say that the bill has no constitutional warrant, it is open to that objection as well. It is impolitic because it is not demanded by any principle of right or expediency; it is unjust because it violates the inherent right of every State to regulate its own internal affairs, and it is unconstitutional in that it seeks to establish a monopoly of rights and privileges in favor of color. The fourteenth amendment, under which alone authority for the bill is claimed, simply defines what citizenship shall be, and declares that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." Yet here is a bill which says to each State: "You must mix white and black in the same school." Is it not easy to see that such a measure is as arbitrary as it is unjust? By what right does Congress interfere with the schools of the States, organized by the State and supported by the State? Yet this is not only contemplated in the bill, but an amendment, allowing each State to provide separate schools for black and white, was voted down. And what good is sought to be accomplished? Does Congress really think to force whites and blacks into the same school? And if it succeed, will it benefit the black, will it change his color or better his condition? On the contrary, the result of this foolish legislation will be to overthrow the entire school system of the South; it will retard the education of the negro; it will arouse antipathies, and it will weaken public confidence in our national legislature—a confidence which is already no stronger than it should be. The truth is, our State governments, North, South, East and West, are sufficiently well established to attend to their own legislation. They not only do not ask for help from Congress, but we believe they are every way better qualified to know what they want, and provide what they want, than Congress is able to provide for them. The future of the African in this country depends now very largely upon himself. All his rights are, under the law, secured to him. His opportunities for advancement are, so far as the law can make them, equal with those of the whites. Now let special legislation in his behalf cease. Let Congress give us a return to specie payments, reduce our taxes, weed out its supernumeraries, consolidate superfluous "bureaus" and reduce the expenses of government. So long as Congress leaves these all important matters unsettled, it has no time to waste over an impracticable and buugling civil rights bill.

Death of the Rev. Thomas Maddin, D. D.

The Nashville Christian Advocate of June 27 says:

Dr. Maddin is dead! We can scarcely believe it. Last week he visited our office, as usual, to get a bundle of exchange newspapers for the hospital for the insane, of which he was chaplain. We pleasantly remarked that the friends who teach in the penitentiary had exhausted their supply, and he must come on Saturday for his share. But, alas, Saturday morning brought us this note from his sons: "Our beloved and venerable father died this morning at eight o'clock, at the Maxwell House. Please come immediately, and if Bishop McTyeire is at the Publishing House bring him with you, or any other of father's clerical friends." In company with Bishop McTyeire and Dr. McFerrin we hastened to the place, and found him dead in death. On Friday evening, June 19, he went to the house of Dr. Hayes; was instantly seized with severe palus; returned to the Maxwell House; spent the night in great agony, mitigated as much as possible by the kind and judicious attention of his sons, who did all they could for him, as masters of the healing art knowing too well that the case was past all human skill. They were aware that for months an abdominal tumor had been forming, and that the aneurism of the aorta had reached its crisis, and death was certain. Soon after he was laid in bed he became unconscious—insensible of communicating with any one in regard to his condition and prospects. But no one needed a lasting testimony from Thomas Maddin. Such a long, blameless, useful, happy life as his could have no other end than "a triumphant one," though the sharpest pangs of death" were commissioned to "break his way to heaven." There he lay, calm and placid in death! There were his two manly sons and widowed daughter (whose affliction was intense and beautiful,) bathed in tears. There were the grandchildren, stunned with grief. There was the manuscript of the sermon he intended to preach on Sunday, about the one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the harpers harping with their harps. He thought he, when he wrote it, that he would so soon

> Mount and join their song,
> And be an angel too!

But in twelve hours after his attack he was hurried over the everlasting hills.

Rev. Dr. B. M. Palmer, we are glad to learn, continues as pastor of the First Presbyterian church of this city.

Thou lookest too often in thy glass; thou wilt not so much see thy grace as thy folly.

Assessments of the Board of Missions.

The Board of Missions, at a meeting held in Louisville after the adjournment of the General Conference, ordered that the assessments on the Annual Conferences for the support of missions under the care of the board shall be graduated according to the assessments for the support of the Bishops. As that assessment was made by the General Conference, representing every Annual Conference in the connection, it was presumed to be the most equitable arrangement that could be made. It will take the amount estimated to cover the necessary expenses of the board. Until the ensuing sessions of the Annual Conferences the board will operate under the old constitution. The Conferences will make their own distribution among the districts of the amounts assessed. These amounts must be raised. This is a simple necessity. The assessments are as follows:

Baltimore	$4,050 00
Virginia	4,500 00
Western Virginia	750 00
North Carolina	4,200 00
South Carolina	2,100 00

A curious note, which comes from Russia, is of a visit which Humboldt once paid to Iszym, in Siberia. Carrying a letter of introduction from the Governor General, he went to the house of the chief government functionary of the place, M. Skotin, who was apparently a sort of Goodman Dull of immense self-importance and ignorance. The first thing that the Governor General heard of the savant was in a long letter from the wise Skotin:

"Some days ago," he said, "there came here a German named Gumbolt, a dried-up little man, looking anything but respectable. As, however, he brought with him a letter from your excellency, in which I am directed to treat him with politeness and consideration, I received him with all due respect. At the same time, I must observe that this individual seems to me very suspicious, and even dangerous. From the first he did not please me; he gossiped too much, and did not like the fare I offered him, though I have a cook, Ferlisa, who makes excellent progs, and would be most happy to offer some to your excellency. * * * He seemed to despise both myself and my hospitality, and he evidently looked down upon the most eminent officials of the town. On the other hand, he is continually talking with the Poles and other political criminals under my charge. Your excellency will forgive my boldness in saying this, but these conversations with political criminals could not escape my observation, especially as a few days since, after a long conference, he went out with them at night to the top of a hill which commands the town. There they took out of a case which they had brought with them an instrument in the shape of a long tube, which seemed to me and my colleagues like a huge cannon. This they placed on a three-legged stand, and then aimed it straight at the town. Each of them approached the instrument, apparently to adjust it so as to rectify the aim. Seeing the great danger which threatened the inhabitants of the town, which is built entirely of wood, I immediately ordered the town guard, which consists of a sub-officer and six men, to march to the spot with loaded muskets and not lose sight of this German's proceedings. If the man's treacherous designs prove what I suspect them to be, we are ready to risk our lives for the Czar and for holy Russia."—New York Tribune.

Fraternal Correspondence.—It would seem, says the Southwestern Presbyterian, that fraternal conferences with a view to organic union are not so enticing as they were a year or two ago. Then the influence of the great public made it a very serious matter to hint a suspicion that should disparage in the slightest the bubbling feelings and gushing tenderness which formed the perfumed envelopes, and which were supposed to represent the contents of the numerous overtures projected by our diplomatic Northern brethren upon the Southern churches. But, as Dr. Johnson used to say, "the great public is a great baby." It is amused by toys, and has little capacity for anything more serious.

And so, on sober second thought, fraternal correspondence with a view to organic union is regarded more cautiously. The Southern Methodists decline such propositions coming from the Northern Methodists. The Cumberland Presbyterians decline such propositions from the Northern Presbyterians, and discharge their committee. The Dutch Reformed decline similar propositions from the Northern Presbyterians, and discharge their committee.

It is said that "there are worse things than war." And the opinion seems to be gaining ground that there are better things than "fraternal correspondence with a view to organic union."

"I think," said a fellow, "I should make a good member of the Legislature, for I use their language. I received two bills a short time since, with requests for immediate payment; the one I ordered to be laid on the table, the other to be read that day six months."

Immense Contributions.

The Church Missionary Society of England reports as its receipts for the last year the immense sum of $1,206,105. But what is even better than this the society has resolved to abstain from two foreign fields of labor because their operations in them might interfere with other societies. This is a spirit that might well be imitated by every missionary society in the world. One man gave this society $100,000 as a thank-offering for the recovery of a beloved child from sickness.

This Church (of England) Missionary Society represents what may be called the evangelical portion of the church, while the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel is supported by the high churchmen and ritualistic wing. The receipts of this society are $551,000; and its spirit may be learned from the following fact stated by the London Times:

"The Church of England (or its representative in these matters, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel) wanted to have a Bishop of Madagascar who might go out there as the representative of the church which is still associated—identical, some say—with the State in this country. Such a bishop would, of course, be the spiritual representative of England, carrying a high civil as well as religious authority. Against this the missionaries already in possession very naturally remonstrated, and the remonstrances, wisely—necessarily, we should rather say—were duly attended to. Our government, considering the many forms of Christians who have to be satisfied at home, did not venture, and indeed did not wish, to give the royal name and aid to the sending out of a man who would seem to override and overthrow the just and beneficent position held by the missionaries there. Thereupon the Church of England (this Propagation Society) procured the consecration of a bishop by the Scottish Episcopal Church, and sent him out there as if to represent the Church of England. One result was to place the Church Missionary Society in a difficulty which it could only escape by leaving the island altogether. The whole proceeding seems as equivocal as it is possible to imagine respectable persons finding themselves unaccountably led into. It certainly looks about as bad a way of getting into a fold as one can conceive in these quiet and orderly days."

The Wesleyan Missionary Society received last year $839,975, and the London Missionary Society $589,545. The British and Foreign Bible Society's receipts were $1,104,720. The aggregate of the various receipts of the religious societies in England, whose headquarters are in London, was $8,148,035—more than eight millions of dollars in gold. We are apt to feel some degree of self-complacency in view of the large receipts of our benevolent societies, but the measure of giving in England suggests to us that other people do something as well as we.—New York Observer.

Books and Periodicals.

Letters to the Children. By Uncle Bob, of the Western Methodist. With an introduction by R. A. Young, D. D. Nashville, Tennessee: Southern Methodist Publishing House, 1874.

Thirty-eight letters, all addressed to children and young people, and calculated to do them good. They are very interesting to us, and we find it rather difficult to lay the book down when in the middle of one of these racy and wide-awake letters. There is a brief child's catechism at the end of the volume. For sale by the Publishing House, Nashville, and at the Depository, New Orleans.

Scribner's Monthly for July is splendidly illustrated, as usual. Contents: The Great South—Some Notes on Missouri, the Heart of the Republic; The Mysterious Island, chapters 7 and 8; A Four-Leaved Clover, part 2; Answer; The Shakespeare Death-Mask; Old-Time Music—The Spinning Wheel; "O Birds that Flit by Ocean's Rim;" Katherine Earle, chapters 21, 22 and 23; Our Eschatology; Studies of Some British Authors; The Fire at Grantley Mills; A Summer's Ghost; Strange Scenes in Strange Lands; Topics of the Time; The Old Cabinet; Home and Society; Culture and Progress; Nature and Science; Etchings.

Georgia Musical Eclectic.—The June number of this excellent art journal comes to us freighted with good music and interesting literature. The music alone in each number of this publication is well worth the subscription price—$1 a year. Specimen copies sent free. Address Guilford, Wood & Co., Atlanta, Georgia.

Lippincott's Magazine for July is handsomely illustrated. Vignettes from the Schuylkill Valley is a very interesting and instructive article, and copiously illustrated. Old Lisbon and Its Overthrow and Recollections of Archbishop Whately are also excellent and entertaining.

Our Sunday school periodicals for July are out in good time, and will be eagerly welcomed by teachers and children. Now is a good time to enlarge your orders for these valuable publications. They are cheap and most necessary to our Sunday school work.

Old and New for July has: Old and New, The Way We Live Now, Artificial Teeth, The Protestant Theory of Authority, Washing Up and Washing Down, Technical Education, French and German Schools, and other articles.

St. Nicholas for July is as rich and varied as heretofore in its articles and illustrations. We observe that that excellent child's paper, the Children's Hour, by T. S. Arthur, of Philadelphia, has been merged in St. Nicholas.

Good Things for the Young of All Ages for June has: Hilda's Roses, The Gipsy Girl, and a great number of sprightly stories and beautiful pictures.

The Raleigh (North Carolina) Christian Advocate of June 10 says:

Our people were highly favored in having Bishop J. C. Keener spend last Sabbath in Raleigh, preaching morning and evening to an immense audience at Edenton Street church. Both sermons were able and eloquent, evincing profound thought and eliciting high commendation from men of every rank and station in life. He goes to Trinity College to preach the commencement sermon on Wednesday, the tenth instant. We shall hail with pleasure a visit from the Bishop to our city and to our Conference at any time.

The Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, D. D., has been elected president, and the Rev. E. E. Hoss a professor, in Pacific College, Santa Rosa, California. Good men, both, and will do much work.

God loves you; let this thought equalize all states. Let him do with us as with the waves of the sea, and whether he takes us to his bosom or casts us upon the sand—that is, leaves us to our own barrenness—all is well.

Shall I grudge to spend my life for him who did not grudge to shed his life-blood for me?—Beveridge.

MARRIED.

Sapp—Glover.—By Rev. J. H. Stone, April 30, 1874, at the residence of the bride's mother, on Shelly Island, Catahoula parish, Louisiana, Mr. A. J. Sapp to Miss Mary Glover, all of the above-named parish.

Williams—Garrett.—On the fourteenth of June, 1874, by Rev. C. McDonald, Mr. W. T. C. Williams and Mrs. M. K. Garrett, all of Scott county, Mississippi.

Fort—Barker.—At the residence of Judge J. J. Beauchamp, in Macon, Mississippi, by Rev. E. E. Hamilton, June 23, 1874, Mr. Lewis A. Fort, of Starkville, Mississippi, and Miss Eugenia A. Barker, of Macon.

Querterurocs—Doherty.—On the fourth of June, 1874, at the hotel in Amite City, Louisiana, by the Rev. D. P. Bradford, Mr. Patrick P. Querterurocs, of Columbus, Kentucky, to Miss Lottie Doherty, of Clay City, Illinois.

East and West Feliciana (Louisiana) papers will please copy.

E. E. F. Ross, Esq., connected for several years with the Christian Advocate, left on the evening of June 17 to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

We call special attention to the advertisement of the Warm Springs of North Carolina. These springs are easy of access, situated in a mountainous region, and celebrated for the remarkable efficacy of the water in curing endemic diseases peculiar to malarious regions, as well as chronic ailments. The living is fine, the associations are said to be refined, and the air mild and pure; but one of the special attractions to those who may visit the springs from New Orleans for the restoration of health will be that our fellow-citizen, Dr. S. E. Hale, formerly of this city, is the resident physician. Those who have occasion to consult the doctor will be convinced of his good judgment and skill as a physician, and find him at the same time a refined Christian gentleman.

W. Harrington & Co.—We are glad to learn that the continuance of the Grange agency of W. Harrington & Co. will not be interrupted by the death of our lamented friend, W. Harrington, the senior member of the firm, on the twelfth of May last. By the action of the executive committee of the State of Mississippi, Mr. K. Harrington, the surviving partner, was appointed to continue the agency, which will be done in the same name and style. The same faithful and competent men are in charge of the business, bringing to the aid of this rapidly-growing firm energy and experience. The patrons will continue to address W. Harrington & Co.

Messrs. Hyver & Co., whose advertisement appears in our columns this day, are manufacturers of chronometers and watches, and repairers of watches, clocks, music boxes, etc. Their establishment is located on Bienville, near Royal street. Give them a call when work in their line is wanted.

D. H. Wallace & Co., cotton factors and purchasing agents, offer their services and the advantage of their experience to those who may wish to make purchases, as well as to dispose of cotton or any kind of produce consigned to them. They are located at 38 Perdido street.

We have had for several months in constant use the Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, and it has given such satisfaction to the guests of our house that our orders for it have been larger than for all other kinds of sauce combined.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warm Springs,
MADISON COUNTY, WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

These Springs are situated in the midst of the highest ranges of mountains east of the Mississippi river, in a country truthfully called the Switzerland of America.

THE BATHS consist of powerful Mineral Water, at a temperature of from 98° to 102 degrees Fahrenheit. As these baths are taken at the Springs where the water rises, there is no chance for depreciation of mineral qualities, which renders them superior to those of the Hot Springs of Arkansas and Virginia.

INVALIDS seeking health can find no more favorable place on this continent. There are also here Cold Sulphur Springs, equal to the Yellow Sulphur Springs of Virginia.

THE HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS are unsurpassed at any watering-place in this country.

BOARD—$40 per month; $12.50 per week; $2 per day. Children under ten years of age and colored servants half price.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL DISCOVERY OF THE AGE.

Mr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, has discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,
FROM
The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind o Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

Roxbury, Mass.

Dear Madam: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a comfort of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Raw and Inflamed,

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

Directions for Use.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly,

DONALD KENNEDY.

BABY-LAND.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

How many miles to Baby-Land?
Any one can tell;
Up one flight,
To your right;
Please to ring the bell.

What can you see in Baby-Land?
Little folks in white,
Downy heads,
Cradle-beds,
Faces pure and bright.

What do they do in Baby-Land?
Dream and wake and play,
Laugh and crow,
Shout and grow;
Jolly times have they.

What do they say in Baby-Land?
Why, the oddest things;
Might as well
Try to tell
What a birdie sings.

Who is the Queen of Baby-Land?
Mother, kind and sweet;
And her love,
Born above,
Guides the little feet! Nursery.

FOR THE ADVOCATE.

The Grass Nuts.

Mollie and Jennie Brown were sisters. They were now nine and seven years of age. When they were quite small their father, who had a family of daughters, moved, from a nice little home in the pine woods, where he could have better educational advantages for his children. Now this home was very dear to these children, for they saw none of the disadvantages of being away from any town, and they looked back upon it as being very nearly akin to paradise. It was a cottage, about which climbed roses and honeysuckles in gay profusion. At the foot of the hill upon which the house stood, on one side, was a beautiful little spring, from which bubbled crystal water almost as cool as ice. On another side of the house was the garden. In one corner of it their kind mother planted a great many kinds of flowers, which were far more interesting to them than the luxuriant vegetables that grew there. Near the garden was the sugar-cane patch, which was worth far more to them than all papa's corn. They had all kinds of fruits. Long rows of raspberries bore their luscious fruit, and the crimson faces of rich strawberries were hid beneath the green leaves in the spring-time. Oh! the nice, rich milk and golden butter they had there; but the best thing, and the thing of which these children oftenest dreamed, were grass nuts. The top was something like common grass, the root a little round nut so sweet and so good. They grew all about over the yard, and the children did love so much to hunt them.

After they moved to the new place they used often to search beneath the grasses in vain hope of finding just one precious nut, but with all their effort nothing of the kind had ever met their eyes.

They had two sisters older than themselves, who once went off on a visit. On their return they had many wonderful things to tell. After awhile they opened a paper, and, while Mollie and Jennie were curiously looking on, they handed out two nuts apiece and said:

"Here, these are for you. You must eat one and plant the other."

The children fairly danced with delight. They turned them over, smelled them, looked on every side, as if trying to recognize an old friend. When satisfied with looking at them they began to taste.

"Oh, ain't it good!" "Ain't it sweet!" were the exclamations which fell from their lips while eating. They ran out into the kitchen to tell the cook what they had eaten, as she always took an interest in the children's pleasures, and especially in anything that reminded her of the old home, for she loved it too. Looking out the back gate, they saw the wagon coming loaded with wood. They ran out to tell the driver of the great news, but I suppose he was tired, for he seemed not to take much interest in their talk. They thought he would surely do something to show his appreciation of the wonderful event, so they asked him to let them ride.

"Oh! yes," he said. "Jump on, quick."

"Here's my place," "And here's mine," they said, as they seated themselves on the wood.

"Are you ready?" asked the sable-faced driver.

"Yes, sir," they both answered.

Instead of popping his whip and saying, "Get up, sir," as they expected, he quietly took the oxen from the wagon, and went off to the lot. Now didn't they have a nice ride. They knew it was no use to get mad with that great big man, so they looked into each other's faces, laughed a merry laugh, got down and ran away.

The sun was setting, and they thought it time for them to be planting their grass nuts, which all this time had been tightly clasped in their hands. So they went into their little flower garden, found a mellow place, and deposited their treasures.

"Oh! won't you be glad when they come up, Mollie?"

"Yes, indeed; but we will not eat any for a long time. We will keep planting until we get a good many."

"Yes; but won't it be nice sport to hunt them! Oh! I wish they were up now."

"Well, they can't be, you know; but we will work them well when they do come up, and we will soon have a plenty. But mamma is calling us," and away ran the happy children.

A few days afterward Jennie was thinking of the grass nuts, and, as she expressed it, she got so hungry for one. She wished that she had the one she had eaten. Then she wished that she had a yard full, and she kept thinking of them until she concluded that she would go and see if the one she planted had not sprouted. She took a little stick and worked very gently around it, until out it came! "Not a sprout on it. How nice it looks! I believe I'll eat it. No, no, I must not. But don't it look good?" She took up the corner of her apron and wiped it. How nicely the dirt came off! She kept wiping until it was quite clean. Then she put it in her mouth, and before she knew it, smash! went her little teeth. "Oh! I've ruined it now; I will have to eat it," and I think she was right glad it was ruined, for she enjoyed it very much.

"Well, I must not tell Mollie I was so foolish," she said to herself, so she covered up the place nicely, put back the little stick she had driven down, and went away.

In a day or two she got hungry again, and, in thinking of what she had done, she said to herself: "I believe I will go and get Mollie's, for she will have one and I won't." She kept thinking of it, and listening to the tempting voice, until directly she was in the garden, hunting the nut. "Jennie! Jennie!" she heard.

"Oh! that's Mollie. I hope she won't come in here. I will keep right still."

But here came Mollie. She put back the dirt as fast as she could, but before she got it fixed Mollie was there.

"Oh! yes, Miss Jennie. You are hunting my grass nut. You need not say a word. I reckon I know just what you are after. You are hunting it to eat. You had better go and eat your own."

Jennie was caught so completely, and thought that she must look so mean in her sister's eyes, that she must explain a little. So she said:

"Well, Mollie, I must tell you the truth. I came in here day before yesterday and ate mine, and to-day I wanted another so much that I was looking for yours to eat it. Please don't tell it, and you take yours and plant it where I can't find it."

"La, child, I ate mine three days ago, and to-day I hunted yours, but could not find it. That is the way I knew so well what you were up to when I saw you slipping in here."

"You bad girl," laughed Jennie, and they both had a good laugh and agreed not to tell it.

They are grown-up ladies now, and have little boys and girls of their own, to whom they sometimes tell the story of the grass nuts, and they laugh right merrily over it.

Elephants at Sea.

The hoisting into the air, and lowering elephants into the hold of a ship, is not only an unusual sight to most men, but also a strange experience to most elephants. They were lashed with strong ropes, slung as far as practicable in slings, hoisted up with cranes with three-fold tackles, and lowered into the steamer's hold like bales of cotton. When in the hold they were placed in pens built of strong teak-timber baulks, bolted to the ship's side to prevent them from breaking loose. The fear the animals suffered was the only pain they underwent, and by watching the eyes of the poor beasts their terror was very manifest. Tears trickled down their mild countenances, and they roared with dread, more especially when being lowered into the hold, the bottom of which was sanded for them to stand upon. We are told that one timid female elephant actually fainted, and was brought to with a fan and many gallons of water.

At sea it appears that the animals got into a curious habit of occasionally—evidently with a preconcerted signal—setting to work rocking the ship from side to side, by giving themselves simultaneously a swinging motion as they stood athwart ship, the vessel rolling heavily, as if in a seaway. This they would do for a spell of an hour or more, and then desist for several hours, until the strange freak took them again. When they reached port they were hoisted out of the hold and swam on shore, thirty-five being thus safely landed without any accident whatever. When they were released from the sling it was a supreme moment for the mahout, who was always on the elephant's neck from the time of its touching the water to letting go. As the word was given to let go each of the elephants, either from the lightness of his heart at being freed from his floating prison or from his own weight, we are not sure which—lightness of heart, like lightness of head, causes elephants and men to play pranks—plunged down deep into the water, the mahout on his neck. The anxiety on the face of the mahout, just one second before the plunge, was a study; so, too, was it when elephant and man rose to the surface again, the former blowing water from his trunk and the latter from his nose.—Calcutta Englishman.

MY CAPTAIN'S ORDERS.—"How is it I don't seem to hear you speak bad words?" asked an "old salt" of a boy on board a man-of-war.

"O 'cause I don't forget my Captain's orders," answered the boy brightly.

"Captain's orders!" cried the old sailor; "I didn't know he gave any."

"He did," said Jem, "and I keep 'em safe here," putting his hand on his breast. "Here they are," said Jem slowly and distinctly: "'I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by earth, for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, yea, yea, nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.'"—Matthew v, 34-37.

"From the good old log-book, I see," said the sailor. "Ah, yes, you've got your orders."

HATS OFF.—Off with your hat, my boy, when you enter the house. Gentlemen never keep their hats on in the presence of ladies, and if you always take your's off when mamma and the girls are by you will not forget yourself or be mortified when a guest or stranger happens to be in the parlor. Habit is stronger than anything else, and you will always find that the easiest way to make sure of doing right on all occasions is to get in the habit of doing right. Good manners cannot be put on at a moment's warning.

Experiments With Potatoes.

The potato, which is an annual plant, represents, in the tubers developed from the stem, the perennial part of a plant. For while the duration of its development is analogous to that of annuals, its functions coincide exactly with those of dicotyledonous shrubs and trees.

The potato-plant, like all annuals, exerts its chief efforts in developing flowers and fruit. Like all annuals, too, it has the power of shortening this period of development when the power of the roots is limited, as also of lengthening it when the extent and power of the roots are increased.

We observe in nature that plants with feebly-developed roots often have a weak, sickly aspect, but yet come to maturity in flower and fruit sooner than stronger individuals, well furnished with roots.

In perenual plants we observe a second effort, which is directed toward preparing and storing up nutritious matter for the consumption of the plant. The preparation of this nutriment is effected by the physiological action of the leaves, under the influence of the roots. The stronger and larger the former are the more is this preparation of food delayed.

The chief points to be attended to, with a view to the increase of tubers, are:

1. To increase the power in the roots, and,

2. To check the transformation which occurs in the leaf.

We obtain both ends simultaneously if, in the fifth, sixth and seventh week after setting the tubers, or at a time when the plants reach the height of six to nine inches above the soil, we pinch off the extreme points of the branches of twigs to the extent of half an inch downward, and repeat this on every branch or twig in the tenth and eleventh week.

The consequences of this check to the development of the stem and branches is a stimulus to the nutrient matters in the plant in the direction of the increase both of roots and of the multiplication of the branches of the stem above ground, which not only favors the power of the root, but also strengthens the leaves and stalks to such a degree that the matters prepared by the physiological action of these parts are increased and applied to the formation of tubers; while at the same time the direct action of the sun's rays on the soil is prevented by the thick foliage, and thus the drying up of the soil and its injurious consequences are avoided.

Led by these views, I made, in 1846, experiments on single potato-plants, carefully marked by pinching off the ends of the branches. They were so readily distinguished in their subsequent growth from the plants beside them, by more numerous branches, larger and darker foliage, that in truth no marking was necessary.

The produce from these plants of tubers was abundant, and the tubers were perfectly healthy; while the plants next to them, which had not been so treated, gave uniformly less produce, at the same time the tubers were rough on the surface, and in many instances attacked with disease.

In the middle of April, 1847, an experiment was made. The potatoes were planted, in the usual way, by an experienced farm servant.

After weeding them in the end of May, I renewed my experiment by pinching off the points of the branches of every second row, and repeated this in the end of June. The result surpassed all expectations. The stalks of the plants not treated on my plan were long, straggling and sparingly furnished with leaves, the leaves themselves small and pale green.

In the next field potatoes of the same variety were planted on the same day and left to nature. They appeared in the first six weeks healthy, even strong, but gradually acquired a poor aspect as the time of flowering and fruit approached, and finally exhibited precisely the same appearance as the rows not treated by pinching off the extremities in the field in which my experiments were made.

In the end of August the difference between the rows treated by me and those not treated became so striking that it astonished all the work people in the neighborhood, who were never tired of inquiring the cause. The stalks of the rows left to themselves were all now partly dried, partly dead. On the contrary, the rows treated as above were luxuriant and in full vigor, the plants bushy, the foliage thick, the leaves large and green, so that most people supposed they had been later planted.

But the difference in the tubers was also very decided. The tubers of the plants in the rows treated on my plan were not indeed larger, but vastly more numerous, and they were neither scabby nor affected with any disease whatever.—Dr. Klotsch, in Liebig's Work on Chemistry.

Early Peaches.

Early fruits should be far more popular with the Southern fruit-grower than they are. In late fruits we can never hope to compete successfully with our Northern neighbors, but in early fruits we have a monopoly that should be made the most of. And in no other class of fruits may this monopoly be made more profitable to us than in that of peaches. Where this crop succeeds there is nothing so profitable—nothing, we mean, that leaves so much clear gain after deducting the necessary expenses of raising and marketing. For instance, we have known Yellow St. John peaches to sell in New Orleans at $27 per bushel; we have often sold the Honey peach at from $10 to $12 per bushel, and to day we learn that a neighbor at Grand Bay has just received the returns of a few boxes of this latter variety, which he shipped on the fourth of June, at $12 to $14 per bushel, hard as the times are. The Northern early peach crop comes in about the first of August; in the Middle States not earlier than the middle of July. Here, then, we have a monopoly of the market, and the very cream of it, for at least a month or six weeks. With the immense, widespread market to sell in, and the limited area of the Gulf States only to supply it, we need never fear that the very early fruit market will be overstocked with good fruit of any kind, and especially of peaches. The following varieties are the most promising very early peaches, new and old: Early Beatrice, Houey, Yellow St. John, Early Tillotson, Alexander, Dr. Hogg and Troth's Early. Hale's Early we leave out as worthless. Let us have detailed accounts of these and others the present season, pro bono publico. Our Home Journal.

POULTRY HINTS.—To be successful in raising chickens several things are necessary. Never set a hen in a box above the ground, but on the ground always. If a person is so situated that the eggs can't be set on the ground, fill the nest about three inches deep with fresh earth, then make the nest on that, and at the end of the first week wash them off in milk-warm water; do the same at the end of the second week, and if the eggs are impregnated every one will hatch. If an egg gets broken, and the other eggs get smeared over with it, the eggs so smeared will not hatch unless washed clean. Eggs require a certain amount of moisture for them to hatch well. When the chickens are hatched confine them for twenty-four hours and do not feed them; after that feed with the yolk of hard-boiled eggs for two or three days, then with mush without salt for a few days more, then feed with meal and water. Try these hints and you'll find this information is worth five years' subscription to this paper.—Vermont Chronicle.

HOW TO SELECT FLOUR.—1. Look at its color; if it is white, with a slightly yellowish or straw-colored tint, it is a good sign. If it is very white, with a bluish cast or with black specks in it, the flour is not good. 2. Examine its adhesiveness. Wet and knead a little of it between the fingers; if it works dry and elastic, it is good; if it works soft and sticky, it is poor. Flour made from spring wheat is likely to be sticky. 3. Throw a little lump of dry flour against a dry, smooth, perpendicular surface; if it adheres in a lump, the flour has life in it; if it falls like powder, it is bad. 4. Squeeze some of the flour in your hand; if it retains the shape given by the pressure, that too is a good sign. Flour that will stand all these tests it is safe to buy. These modes were given by old flour dealers, and we make no apology for printing them, as they pertain to a matter that concerns everybody, namely, the quality of that which is "the staff of life."

THE EARTH CURE FOR ULCERS.—"I dried and pulverized some clay," says a writer in the Country Gentleman, "and recommended it as a valuable remedy to a neighbor woman who had for ten years had a very bad ulcer on her ankle. She had paid our best physicians over $50 for treatment without any relief. She applied the dried clay almost constantly for about six months, and a perfect cure has resulted. The first effect of the preparation was to remove inflammation and relieve pain, and now she says there is no scar remaining, and her limb, which was stiff and lame, is as elastic as when she was a girl. The woman is a very large, fleshy person, about forty years of age. I considered the test a very severe one, and the result very satisfactory. About a gallon of pulverized clay was used."

STICKING SALVE.—In reply to inquiry of a lady for sticking salve, I will give the recipe for the original "Peleg White's salve," once so famous, obtained from himself by an ancestor. I know of nothing better. It is so convenient for sores, wounds or bruises. We would not think of getting along without it. Three pounds of resin, one-half pound of Burgundy pitch, one-half pound of beeswax, one-half pound of mutton tallow.

LIVER AND BLOOD DISEASES.

BY R. V. PIERCE, M. D.

A healthy liver secretes each day about two and a half pounds of bile, which contains a great amount of waste material taken from the blood. When the liver becomes torpid or congested, it fails to eliminate this vast amount of noxious substance, which therefore remains to poison the blood and be conveyed to every part of the system. What must be the condition of the blood when it is receiving and retaining each day two and a half pounds of poison? Nature tries to work off this poison through other channels and organs—the kidneys, lungs, skin, etc—but these organs become overtaxed in performing this labor in addition to their natural functions, and cannot long withstand the pressure, but become variously diseased.

The brain, which is the great electrical center of all vitality, is unduly stimulated by the unhealthy blood which passes to it from the heart, and it fails to perform its office healthfully. Hence the symptoms of bile-poisoning, which are dullness, headache, incapacity to keep the mind on any subject, impairment of memory, dizzy, sleepy or nervous feelings, gloomy forebodings and irritability of temper. The blood itself being diseased, as it forms the sweat upon the surface of the skin, it is so irritating and poisonous that it produces discolored brown spots, pimples, blotches and other eruptions, sores, boils, carbuncles and scrofulous tumors. The stomach, bowels and other organs cannot escape becoming affected, sooner or later, and we have as the result costiveness, piles, dropsy, dyspepsia and diarrhea. Other symptoms are common as bitter or bad taste in the mouth, internal heat, palpitation, teasing cough, unsteady appetite, choking sensation in throat, bloating of stomach, pain in sides or about shoulders or back, coldness of extremities, etc. Only a few of the above symptoms are likely to be present in any case at one time. The liver being the great depurating or blood cleansing organ of the system—set this great "housekeeper of our health" at work, and the foul corruptions which gender in the blood, and rot out, as it were, the machinery of life, are gradually expelled from the system. For this purpose Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, with very small doses daily of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, are pre-eminently the articles needed. They cure every kind of humor, from the worst scrofula to the common pimple, blotch or eruption. Great eating ulcers kindly heal under their mighty curative influence. Virulent blood poisons that lurk in the system are by them robbed of their terrors, and by their persevering and somewhat protracted use the most tainted systems may be completely renovated and built up anew. Enlarged glands, tumors and swellings dwindle away and disappear under the influence of these great resolvents.

TO THE SUFFERERS
WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this dreadful disease, with this medicine; and, what astonishes most, the patient recovered by the use of a single bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not recover by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not affected with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CONVERSATION FAN.

THE LAST AND MOST ABSORBING SENSATION OF THE DAY IS, TO USE A THEatrical phrase, "a great take." Everybody, to be en regle for the season, and to avoid the proscription of imperious fashion, must have A CONVERSATION FAN.

No family circle is complete in social diversions and entertainments without one, and in order to enjoy the pastime it should be distinctly understood that the answers do not numerically follow the questions, but to spice the amusement an answer must be looked for that will afford a fitting response to an interrogatory.

Where a direct answer is not to be found to a direct question, it will be discovered that it furnishes the sequel to a sustained conversation, so that couples can carry on a tete-a-tete, which they may not wish to make audible, by silent indications of numbers.

THE CONVERSATION FAN

is an infallible remedy against dullness, breaking the spell of silence by a suggestive inquiry, furnishing congenial pleasures for an evening's entertainment, and opening up a novel and ingenious method of whiling away agreeable hours at home, in the promenade, at a party or private gathering.

ONLY TEN CENTS A FAN.

To be had at Harp's, Grisham's, Ellis & Bro.'s, Haley's, Kain & Co.'s, and all the Book Stores in the city, and at Piffet's, and issued by

in this Department will commence on Monday, the Sixteenth of NOVEMBER, 1874, and terminate on the third Saturday of March, 1875. Preliminary Lectures on Clinical Medicine and Surgery will be delivered in the amphitheater of the great Charity Hospital, beginning on the Twentieth of October, without any charge to the students. The anatomical rooms will be opened at the same time. The members of the Faculty are visiting physicians and surgeons to the Charity Hospital, and give instruction daily at the bedside of the sick.

FEES.—As the practical advantages afforded in New Orleans for a thorough acquaintance with all the branches of medicine are quite as great as if not superior to those offered by the schools of New York and Philadelphia, the same fees are demanded. For all the Lectures, $140; Matriculation, $5; Practical Anatomy, $10; Graduation, $30. Payment required in advance.

IMPROVED

EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a liner or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the twenty-sixth ultimo:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	1,608
Arkansas		5
Mobile		248
Total		1,358

On Saturday, with no change in quotations at Liverpool, and sales of only 5,000 bales, and with a decline at New York in futures, only a few buyers came forward in most cases for small lots to complete shipments, and the market was extremely dull throughout the day. In fact up to about two P. M. the sales were confined to a little over 200 bales, which was subsequently increased by two purchases of about the same extent, making an aggregate of 650 bales. On Monday the business summed up 1,450 bales. On Tuesday a decline at New York of ⅛c. in spots, and ⅛@5-16c. in futures, rather checked the movement at the opening, although to some extent neutralized by an advance of 2-10 per cent. in sterling exchange (which was subsequently lost) and the sales during the morning were of limited extent, but later in the day buyers came forward more freely, and the entire business embraced 900 bales, at reduced prices for the lower grades, but previous rates for good ordinary and the better qualities. Ordinary sold at 11, 11⅛@11⅜c., and high style low middling, benders', at 11c.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 2,000 bales, against 4,700 for the corresponding time last week and 4,300 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,236,783 bales, against 1,200,017 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 262,412 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 114,759 to France, of 109,893 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 20,151 to Great Britain. We quote:

Inferior	8⅛ @ 9⅝
Low ordinary	10¼ @ 10¾
Ordinary	11 @ 12
Strict ordinary	12½ @ 13¼
Good ordinary	14⅜ @ 14⅞
Strict good ordinary	15⅛ @ 15⅝
Low middling	15⅝ @ 15⅞
Strict low middling	16⅛ @ 16⅜
Middling	16⅝ @ 17

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

VOL. 20. NEW ORLEANS, THURSDAY, JULY 9, 1874. NO. 28.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

NEW YORK, July 1.—Henry Grinnell, well known for having fitted out an expedition in 1850 to search for Sir John Franklin, died here yesterday. He was seventy-five years of age.

BALTIMORE, July 2.—The mayor, Common Council of the city, officers of the Board of Trade, and Corn and Flour Exchange celebrated to-day, by an excursion down the Patapsco, the completion of the deepening and widening of the ship channel between Chesapeake bay and this city. Craighill channel has been improved to the width of four hundred feet, and Brewerton channel to two hundred and fifty, and each to a uniform depth of twenty-four feet at mean low-water mark. The work has been progressing several years, the general government having appropriated $528 000 and the city $625,000 for improving the channel.

MEMPHIS, July 2.—An Avalanche Water Valley, Mississippi, special says: At a meeting of the stockholders of the Mississippi Central railroad, held there yesterday, the action of the directors indorsing the legislative act consolidating the Mississippi Central and New Orleans and Jackson railroads was ratified almost unanimously, the consolidated roads to be known as the New Orleans, St. Louis and Chicago railroad.

The issue of consolidated stock is to be one for three of the Mississippi Central and two for three of the New Orleans and Jackson railroads.

Within the past two days abundant rains have fallen in north Mississippi, except in the vicinity of Water Valley and Oxford, where a good rain has not fallen for two months.

LITTLE ROCK, July 3.—The official vote of thirty counties gives over thirty thousand for the constitutional convention. The remaining forty counties will swell the majority to sixty-five thousand. With the exception of two or three counties, Democrats are elected delegates.

WILMINGTON, July 3.—During the severe thunder storm last night Riddle's cotton mills were struck by lightning and set on fire. The fire was quickly suppressed.

The storm was more severe south. At Newark many trees in the college campus were blown down. Three buildings were struck by lightning and several uprooted. No person was hurt. At Elkton the hotel was unroofed and considerable damage done.

WASHINGTON, July 4.—A hurricane was experienced to-night, coming from the north, which unroofed several houses.

MERIDIAN, July 4.—A passenger train on the Vicksburg and Meridian railroad ran off the track this morning near Edwards' Depot. Two children were killed and three persons dangerously injured.

NEW YORK, July 6.—Five hundred Mormons were among the immigrants from Europe to-day.

SAVANNAH, GA., July 6.—A cyclone passed over the city last night, tearing up trees and uprooting houses. The grand stand at the fair grounds was destroyed. The track of the storm was narrow, but the force was terrific. The display of electrical phenomena was grand.

PATERSON, N. J., July 6.—During a storm in Bergen county hail of an extraordinary size fell and crashed through strong roofs. A mill at Passaic had one thousand panes broken.

FOREIGN.

HALIFAX, July 1.—The steamer Farraday, engaged in laying the new Atlantic cable, left Halifax a week ago. Intelligence from Pictou, just received, represents that she struck an iceberg off Halifax and is a total wreck. Further particulars are expected shortly.

BERLIN, July 2.—The North German Gazette, official organ, pays a warm tribute to Bancroft. It says: The German government sees his departure with regret—a feeling which is lively and general in private as well as official circles—and declares that since Frederick the Great received Franklin the mutual understanding between Germany and the United States has never been more profound than at present.

The Emperor William has presented his portrait, life-size, and painted to order, to Bancroft.

It is stated that the German squadron will be immediately dispatched to the Spanish ports.

YORK, July 2.—The Church of England synod and two Presbyterian synods are meeting here. The question under discussion is on the Episcopal Church unions with each other and with the Canadian Presbyterian Church.

LONDON, July 3.—The debate on the home rule has concluded. Disraeli was unable to agree that Ireland had a right to a greater amount of self-government than Scotland or England; he demonstrated the groundlessness of the complaint that Irishmen were not appointed to high offices of the government, and denied that Ireland was treated as a conquered country. He said two separate Parliaments would constantly be in collision. The minority in each Parliament would be always appealing to the imperial Parliament. He opposed the motion because it was injurious to both countries. At the great crisis of the world, which was nearer than some supposed, to wished the people to be united. To accept this motion would be to produce disintegration in England, and might result in the destruction of the empire. McCarthy, Mitchell, Nolan, the O'Connor, Don and others spoke in support of the motion.

At a late hour the House divided and Dr. Butt's resolution was rejected by a vote of 61 yeas to 458 nays.

LONDON, July 5.—The Great Eastern leaves on the twenty-seventh to lay the cable between Newfoundland and Ireland.

LONDON, July 6.—A special to the Daily Telegraph from Fulda says: The Roman Catholic Bishops seek a settlement of the issue with the Prussian government in total separation of Church and State.

Charbon (Spanish Gangrene.)

A Cuban gentleman writes us as follows with reference to this fatal disease:

This disorder in animals of the horse, mule or ox kind is well known in the Island of Cuba. It is caused by the bite or sting of what is termed the horse or stinging fly, which, after being upon a putrid carcass, lights on any horse or mule. Wherever it first stings it inserts a small amount of poisonous matter. The result is first a small swelling, which continues to increase between the skin and the flesh, and is made perceptible by its pronounced surface. If arrested before being introduced into the circulation the cure is simple and sure; should it be allowed to continue until the poison enters the circulation, the animal swells, suffering terrible pain, evinced by general perspiration, and a quick, spasmodic death.

CURE.

As soon as the superficial swelling is observed, with a red-hot iron of one-quarter of an inch in thickness, encircle well all the swelling, and then every two inches cross-bar in the same manner all the surface within the line of circle, being particular to burn well the skin, to destroy the poisonous matter that is below before it can enter the circulation. After so doing, keep the animal in a shady, cool place, without feed for twenty-four hours, but giving it all the water it desires. A day after besmear the burnt place continually with lard or oil until he sheds the skin, treating it as a simple burn.

PRECAUTION AGAINST THE SPREADING OF THE DISEASE.

Besmear all your animals well with grease, impregnated with garlic, to prevent the flies from attacking them. Bury deeply, or cremate, which is better, all animals dying of charbon—no dog or buzzard will eat it. Be careful less for the saving of a hide you contract the disease, as any wound or scratch can be inoculated with the matter, which, if it enters the circulation, is as bad as hydrophobia.—New Orleans Picayune.

HOW INDIANS DUN.—The Hartford Courant evolves the following theory: There has been some philological doubt as to the phrase: "After him with a sharp stick." It may have occurred to many that the "sharp stick" referred to is the much-feared "January bill." And it would seem that there was some ground for this. The Neesehuan Indians of California have not the brutal and disagreeable habit prevalent among us of sending bills. When one Indian owes another it is considered bad taste, as it is, for the creditor to dun the debtor.

He proceeds with more delicacy. He procures a certain number of sticks, according to the amount of the debt, and paints a ring around the end of each. These he carries and tosses into the debtor's wigwam, and then goes away without a word. The debtor pays the debt and destroys the sticks. It is considered a reproach to have the dunning stick thrown into the wigwam, and the creditor never uses them except with hard customers.

PROF. PATTON has prepared his appeal to the Presbyterian Synod of Illinois from the decision of the Chicago presbytery acquitting Professor Swing. The document fills over a column of the Chicago newspapers, and is summed up under these heads: 1. Irregularities in the proceedings. 2. Hurrying to a decision before important testimony was taken. 3. Prejudice. 4. Mistake. 5. Injustice. Under these heads Professor Patton groups the reasons which induced him to make the appeal. These embrace twenty-three specifications, and are simply the arguments presented by him at the trial.

THE Western Methodist says: A correspondent residing at Oxford, Mississippi, writes: "I learn with much regret that the Rev. Dr. Waddel, chancellor of the University of Mississippi, has tendered his resignation. During almost the whole period of his life he has resided in our State, and has been all this time identified with her educational interests. No man commands in a higher degree the confidence of the entire people of the State; and if he leaves the University, as I hope he will not, it will be an irreparable loss."

REV. WILLIAM A. HARRIS, the eminent president of the Wesleyan Female Institute, Staunton, Virginia, had the degree of doctor of divinity conferred upon him by Randolph Macon College last week.

UNIVERSAL love is a glove without fingers, which fits all hands alike, and none closely; but true affection is like a glove with fingers, which fits one hand only, and sits close to that one.—Richter.

WINTER is cold-hearted,
Spring is yea and nay,
Autumn is a weather-cock,
Blown every way.
Summer days for me,
When every leaf is on its tree,
When Robin's not a beggar
And Jenny Wren's a bride,
And larks hang singing, singing, singing,
Over the wheat-fields wide,
And anchored lilies ride,
And the pendulum spider Swings from side to side.

From the Work.

VICKSBURG DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: The exercises of the Vicksburg District Conference, just closed, at Natchez, were pleasant and profitable. We were not favored with the presence of a Bishop, but under the leadership of Rev. F. M. Featherstun all the items of business were discussed and arranged.

Most of the sermons preached were marked by directness and unction, and the communion service on Sabbath was largely attended and unusually edifying. The genial Christian hospitality extended was most delightful, and often will the pleasure and delight be reproduced in memory.

Dr. Stratton, the very courteous and refined pastor of the Presbyterian church, was introduced to the Conference, and proffered the use of his pulpit, morning and evening. The writer was appointed to preach in the doctor's church, but was compelled, from a severe sick headache, to give the large and attentive audience only half of an attempted sermon.

Dr. Norden, Jewish rabbi, was also welcomed by the Conference, and when introduced made a few pleasant remarks.

Bro. Hunnicutt and his helpmate are doing good, honest, solid work for the church in Natchez.

I saw a portion of "Natchez Under-the-Hill." This, you know, was formerly a resort for thieves, gamblers and outlaws, but now quiet and order reign. Class meeting and preaching now occur weekly at this notorious locality. But here I arrest my pen. Farewell.

Fraternally yours,
J. BANCROFT.

VICKSBURG, MISS., June 30, 1874.

COLUMBIA, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.—Mr. Editor: We have just closed a protracted meeting at Welcome Home, one of my appointments on the Caldwell circuit. This being the third revival which we have had upon the work, I now write and give you a brief account of the good things which the Lord has done for us in these three revivals. Our first was at Masters' chapel, and was upon our first quarterly meeting occasion. The meeting lasted one week. The church was powerfully revived and built up. Sinners were convicted, and twenty-three were converted to God. Never in my life have I seen a more powerful baptism of the Holy Spirit. It was truly a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord here. I received six members into the church.

Our next meeting was held at Copenhagen, where the Lord also met with us, and that to own and to bless. Here we also had a powerful manifestation of the Spirit in the hearts of his people. The church was established more firmly upon the rock of ages, and some eight sinners found Jesus precious to their souls. We received here eight into the church.

Our last meeting at Welcome Home was truly a spiritual feast, and demonstrated clearly the blessed Savior's promise, "I will not leave you comfortless," for the Comforter was present, and he was in every believer's heart, and his power to comfort was made known to twelve penitents. Twelve hearts were filled with the glorious light of redemption. Here we had eight additions to our church.

This gives us, as you will see, a total of forty-three conversions at the three meetings. I have received altogether into the church twenty-four members. Much is due to the earnest, zealous labors of Bros. Philip Allen and H. M. Ragan. They are approved workmen of the Lord. The entire circuit is in a healthy, prosperous condition, and we are hopeful, prayerful and watchful.

Your brother in Jesus,
W. V. TAYLOR, JR., P. C.

JULY 2, 1874.

BAYOU MACON, NORTH LOUISIANA.—Mr. Editor: You can scarcely imagine our situation during the overflow. The General Conference met, transacted its business and adjourned before we were any the wiser of its proceedings. Just imagine six weeks without an ADVOCATE. I shall not stop to describe the rejoicing occasioned by the first regular mail, bringing the long wished-for ADVOCATE.

The water is gone, and we feel thankful to God and take courage. The hills, as they are called, were not under water, but the extreme wet weather impeded the farmer in the spring, and since the rain stopped in April things have moved on steadily, and crops look well, except that in certain localities the rain has not been sufficient for corn. In the last six days I have been up and down the Macon some forty-five miles, and all seem to be in good spirits, expecting to reap a bountiful harvest if nothing blights the crop in the future.

I hardly know what to say in reference to the church in this country. It is right hard to tell exactly how we are getting on. Some are joining and some going out, and some dying. We received three into the church last Sabbath. Several more will come in as soon as they are ready. We have been very cautious, since we heard Bishop Marvin, last winter, at Baton Rouge, on the subject of receiving members into full connection.

Under the arrangements of the new Discipline we may and doubtless will lose some members, but I think while we lose in number we will gain in spirituality; so in the end the church is benefited.

Our camp meeting comes off at Midway on the tenth of September. We hope to see both the editor and publisher of the ADVOCATE present. However, notice will be given in the ADVOCATE, and an invitation extended before that time, for fear they might forget it. Rev. C. F. Evans, of Monroe station, has made arrangement with the railroad companies to return all free west of Tallula on certificate of attendance at camp meeting.

Perhaps the editor would like to have a word on finance. We have failed to have any quarterly meeting this year so far; no allowance made. We have received but very little so far. Our faith is in God, and our rule not to cross the river before we get to it. If we do our duty God will provide. So we have no fears but that we will get a living if we continue to walk humbly before him. This is a year to try men's souls. Pray for us and ours, that we be faithful in all things pertaining to God's house.

Acts of the General Conference.

The Western Methodist gives the results in the following carefully prepared article. It is somewhat lengthy, but of interest to the most of our readers.

Page 25, chapter 1, section 2, "Of the General Rules," it was voted by a two-thirds majority to strike out: "Drunkenness or drinking spirituous liquors, unless in case of necessity;" and substitute:

"Making, buying, selling or using, as a beverage, intoxicating liquors."

To strike out and substitute as above there must be a concurrence therewith of three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences.

Page 45, chapter 2, section 2, "Of the Examination of the Life and Official Administration of the Preachers," so amended as to insert the following additional answer to question 7:

"Answer 4. But if the complaint be wholly on account of habitual failure in official administration, and any member of the Conference object to the passage of his character wholly on this account, the question, 'Shall his character pass?' shall be put on this point alone. And if a majority of the Conference refuse to pass his character because he is not blameless in official administration, the Conference shall grant him an honorable location. Provided, nevertheless, If the delinquent preacher desires to be tried another year (making suitable acknowledgments,) and promises, if tried another year, to come up to the measure of his duty in these respects, the Conference may employ him another year, and upon the issues of that year shall depend his restoration or absolute location."

Page 48, chapter 2, section 3, question 1, answer 1, "Of the District Conferences," add:

"But should it become necessary, from any unforeseen cause, to change the place, after it has been fixed by the Conference, the presiding elder shall have power to make the change."

Page 48, chapter 2, section 3, question 1, answer 2, "Of the District Conferences," amended so as to constitute superannuated preachers members of the District Conference for the district in which they reside, "whether resident without or within the limits of the Annual Conference to which they belong." And page 50, chapter 2, section 2, question 1, answer 1, "Of the Quarterly Conferences," amended so as to constitute superannuated preachers members of the Quarterly Conference for the circuit or station in which they reside, "whether without or within the limits of the Annual Conference to which they belong."

Page 51, chapter 2, section 4, question 2, answer, "Of the Quarterly Conferences," add:

"But the presiding elder and preacher in charge shall have authority, when they judge it necessary, to change the place."

Page 51, chapter 2, section 4, question 4, answer 2, "Of the Quarterly Conferences," add:

"And to elect superintendents of Sunday schools, on the nomination of the preacher in charge."

Page 53, chapter 2, section 4, "Of the Business of the Quarterly Conference," add to answer 6:

"No recommendation from a Quarterly Conference to an Annual Conference shall be of any force after the session of the Annual Conference next following the grant of such recommendation."

Pages 53-55, chapter 2, section 4, question 5, "On the Order of Business in the Quarterly Conference," a new form was adopted, which, as it is long and has already appeared in our issue of May 30, we do not reprint. The fifteenth question was amended by inserting, "or for readmission." We give an item which was adopted as an amendment to the report—it is a question to be numbered 21:

"What is doing for the cause of education?"

Page 62, chapter 3, section 2, question 3, answer 2, "Of the Duties of Bishops," amended so as to make Key West, Florida Conference, one of the exceptions to the law which forbids the Bishops allowing any preacher to remain in any circuit or station more than four years successively.

Page 68, chapter 3, section 3, question 1, answer 6, "Of the Duties of Presiding Elders," amended so as to add after the words, "whether the rules respecting the instruction of children have been faithfully observed," the following clause:

"Whether the preacher in charge administers the sacraments, holds Church Conferences, enforces moral discipline, and attends to the collections assessed in his charge."

Page 73, chapter 3, section 4, after answer 15, "Of Duties of Preachers in Charge," add:

"Answer 16. To make a written report of the condition of all the claimants on the Conference collection within his pastoral charge at each Annual Conference, to be submitted to the joint board of finance."

Pages 73 and 74, chapter 3, section 4, question 1, answer 16, "Of the Duties of Preachers in Charge," add the following as to church certificates:

"This certificate shall not be valid after twelve months, unless the holder show good cause why it was not sooner presented. And the holder shall be regarded as having withdrawn from the church. A member presenting a certificate shall be held responsible to the society receiving said certificate for his conduct from the date of the certificate.

Page 75, chapter 3, section 5, answer 3, "Of Admitting Preachers on Trial," so amended as to read:

"The Annual Conference may then admit him as on probation, by a vote of the majority. Observe: This relation of being on trial embraces the requisites of a competent pastorate, and must apply as well to proper administrative qualifications as to acceptable preaching ability. One on trial may be discontinued for want of efficiency in either of these respects without doing him any wrong; otherwise it would be no trial at all."

Page 80, chapter 3, section 7, question 2, "Of the Time of Probation of a Traveling Preacher for the Office of a Deacon," and page 81, chapter 3, section 8, question 2, "Of the Time of Probation of a Traveling Deacon for the Office of an Elder," both so amended as to make the time of probation two years in each case—a return to the old rule.

Page 80, chapter 3, section 7, question 3, answer 1, "Of the Duties of Traveling Deacons," amended so as to read:

"Answer 1. To administer baptism and solemnize the rite of matrimony in the absence of an elder."

Page 82, chapter 3, section 8, question 3, answer 1, "Of the Duties of a Traveling Elder," amended so as to read:

"Answer 1. To administer baptism and the Lord's Supper, and to solemnize the rite of matrimony and perform all parts of divine worship."

Page 82, chapter 3, section 8, add at the close:

"Question 4. What shall be done in the case of missionaries and native preachers in foreign lands where there is no Annual Conference?

"Answer. The Bishops in charge of the mission shall have authority to ordain to the office of deacon and elder on the recommendation of the superintendent and resident missionaries, or, if there be none, at his discretion."

Page 88, chapter 3, section 11, question 4, answer 1, "Of Local Preachers," add:

"And they shall report in writing the extent and results of their labors to the fourth Quarterly Conference."

Page 89, chapter 3, section 11, question 4, "Of Local Preachers," add:

"Answer 5. A preacher receiving a certificate of location or of official standing, and failing to present the same to some Quarterly Conference within the period of six months from the date of said certificate, shall not be recognized as a local preacher in our church, unless he satisfy the Quarterly Conference to which he may apply that the failure was unavoidable."

Page 100, chapter 3, section 15, question 5, "Of the Duties of a Recording Steward," so amended as to require him not only to preserve the records of the Quarterly Conference, but "to have the same at the Quarterly Conference."

Page 100, chapter 3, section 15, question 6, "Of the Duties of a District Steward," so amended as that the answer reads:

"Answer. To attend the district stewards' meeting for the purpose of estimating the salary and traveling expenses of the presiding elder, and to apportion the same and such other amounts as are to be raised in the district among the several charges, and to report the same to his Quarterly Conference and board of stewards."

"2. Trustees for district property may be appointed by the Quarterly Conference of the circuit or station where such property is located, or if in a city, where there are two or more pastoral charges, by the Quarterly Conference which the presiding elder may designate. The presiding elder shall have the right of nomination, subject to confirmation or rejection by the Quarterly Conference."

"When a district board of trustees is appointed by a Quarterly Conference, such board shall hold the same relations in all respects to the Conferences so appointing."

Page 102, after answer 4, add:

"When two or more circuits or stations shall be united, the board of trustees shall by such action be considered dissolved; and the Quarterly Conference of the new circuit or station shall appoint a board of trustees, as provided for in this section."

Page 102, chapter 3, section 16, question 2, answer 3, "Of Trustees," amended so as to allow the appointment of "seven, five or three" trustees for church property, when proper persons, as many as nine, cannot be procured.

Page 113, chapter 5, section 5, answer 1, "Of Sunday Schools," add to the first sentence:

"And it is recommended that the schools be under the control of our own denomination and use our own publications."

Page 114, chapter 5, "Of Sunday Schools," section 4, as it is now, to be section 5, and section 4 hereafter to be as follows:

"Let each Annual Conference elect a corresponding secretary to represent the Sunday school interests of that Conference to the Sunday school secretary elected by the General Conference."

"1. Each member of the church is expected to pay according to his or her several ability for the support of the ministry, and the stewards of each circuit or station shall determine whether payments are to be made weekly, monthly or quarterly during the year. They shall then ascertain how much each member is able and willing to pay in the installments fixed by the stewards, and whatever amount each member agrees to pay he or she shall be under solemn obligation to pay, and can only be released from this obligation by the order of the stewards, or by vote of the Church Conference, for good cause shown."

Page 146, chapter 9, section 3, paragraph 1, "Of the Support of Bishops," amended so as to make it the duty of the committee on episcopacy of the General Conference to estimate for the salary not only of the Bishops, but "of the widows and orphan children of deceased Bishops."

Page 167, chapter 11, section 4, paragraph 2, so amend as to require after the sale of church property that has gone out of use or should be removed to another place, that the proceeds shall be "invested in other church property."

Pages 170 and 171, chapter 12, section 1, in the forms for "Devises by Will or Donations," add, after "agent of the Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church South," these words: "And to his successors in office."

If we mistake not, we have brought to view all the acts of the General Conference which affect the Book of Discipline, except one point—it was ordered that the book should hereafter contain the boundaries of the Annual Conferences.

Why the Mouth is Not Opened.

A HINT TO THE GRANGERS.

The St. Louis Times of the twenty-eighth ultimo tells in very simple and intelligible terms why Congress has failed to agree on any decisive, practical action in our behalf:

Do the people of the West and South know why the Mississippi river has not been opened? The reason is clear. Every grain of wheat, corn or barley that finds its way out of the country through the mouth of the Mississippi is so much business taken from New York, Boston or some Northeastern city; hence their objection. This influence against the improvement of the Mississippi originated long before the inauguration of railroads; and now that the antagonism of interest of these vast corporations is set against the work, its chances are still more reduced.

Whatever Congress has done in the way of clearing the mouth, or "removing obstructions," as it is phrased in the appropriation bill, has been done in the way of pretense to keep quiet the interest that has so long been preyed upon—a sort of tub to the agricultural whale, whose grain is utterly eaten up by freight tariffs before it reaches New York or any other Eastern seaport. It has never been the intention of the Northeastern ring to permit the mouth of the great river to be cleared out so that a depth of water of sixteen feet could be relied on. Less than that depth, with the prevailing uncertainty of the channels, they can afford to ignore; less than that would make the protest troublesome, and your Northeast monopolist is a quiet sort of bug. He would rather not take the whole pie, if there is to be a fuss about it.

Now, if the grangers of the Mississippi valley want to direct their efforts against a combination that is yearly taking money from their pockets, and broad out of their children's mouths, here is work for them. This is not politics; it is a plain demand of tribute made upon a rural by an urban district. Boston, New York and Philadelphia demand that the West shall send its grain to them, and let the profits of production go to the traffickers and transporters; they have the power to—and do—prevent the deepening of the Mississippi's mouth, so that this grain, after being literally floated down the river at slight expense compared with the cost of railroad carriage to New York, can get to sea, and from New Orleans the cost to Europe is no greater than from New York. Let the grangers of the great valley act on this hint, and they can have millions of dollars poured into the lap of the West that is now enriching their oppressors and strengthening the bonds which bind them tributary to the greed of the lake region and the Northeast.

THURSDAY, JULY 9, 1874.

A PRAYER.

Have mercy, oh, my God; my cup
Is brimming high with tears;
And I am bending low to thee,
Bowed down by earthly cares.

My life is barren, Lord, of fruit;
I gather only leaves,
And reel beneath the burden of Unprofitable sheaves.

Thou canst remove the bitter grief
That taints my daily life;
Christ, I have called upon thy name;
Still thou the waves of strife.

My brow is wet with drops of pain,
My heart is faint and sore;
Lord, who hath power all things to do,
Thy peace upon me pour.

The thorns are thick upon my way,
The blossoms very few;
My feet are wounded; bleeding now,
I turn me unto you.

One by one my joys have left me,
Floated far beyond my sight;
I am groping, groping blindly;
Jesus, guide me to the light.

Christ, my Master, hear my pleading;
Suffer me to come to thee;
I am lonely and forsaken;
Thou my help and comfort be.

Lo! I'm bending, praying, pleading;
Have mercy, oh, my God! on me;
Guide me through the deepening darkness,
Guide me safely unto thee.

See my hands are stretched toward thee,
Wounded with the chains of care;
Take them in thine own, my Savior;
Bid them wreath of glory bear.

Bind my brow with brilliant blossoms,
Fill my heart with heavenly joy;
I am sick and wounded, weary;
Give me rest without alloy.

Rest me on thy gentle bosom,
Lift the burden from my brow;
Ease my soul of bitter sorrow;
Christ, my Savior, hear me now.

Christian Faith—What Is It?—No. 1.

The word of God teaches that "by grace are ye saved through faith." Now when and how do we attain to that faith so essential to secure our salvation or justification?

Much as this fundamental principle of our holy religion has been written and preached upon, there always have been and there are today many whose minds, although earnestly longing after truth, are in a perfect maze regarding it. Yea, more; we believe that some, if not many, sincere inquirers after salvation have been made to despond and finally to fall away by reason of doubts on this vital subject, caused by the failure of Scripture teachers—in our church as well as others—to explain the true meaning of Christian faith with that clearness and precision which its importance demands. Many, very many, confound faith with feeling; and right here, let us ask, with due deference, if, in conducting revivals, there are not many good people who, both by act and speech, tend to produce in the minds of seekers of religion a confounding of these two things? The mind of the writer was perplexed on this subject until he was forty-two years of age, although reared by eminently pious parents in the bosom of the Methodist Church. In our youth we became interested upon the subject of our soul's salvation. We were deeply in earnest. We were willing to give up all for Christ. We kept back nothing. We time and again wrestled and agonized in prayer until our poor body was wet with sweat produced by the soul's agony. We expected—what? We looked for a sudden rolling away of the burden of our sins as tangible as the falling away of the bundle from the back of Bunyan's pilgrim hero. We contemplated a change as marked as would be the blowing of a warm south wind after a terrible norther. We expected, at the very least, that there would be immediately imparted that "peace which passeth all understanding." But we did not realize any of these things. It was a sad experience. Well, what was the consequence? We became discouraged, went back to the world, and for many years continued to be one of the most desperately wicked men that ever desecrated the face of God's green earth. At forty-two years of age, through the infinite mercy of God, we again became awakened. After several days of mourning and agonizing, still as ignorant and mystified as ever on the subject of faith, we happened to have our attention directed to the case of the nobleman (latter part of fourth chapter of St. John,) whose son was sick at Capernaum, who, hearing that the Savior was at Cana of Galilee, went and appealed to him who never turned away a suppliant, entreating him to come and heal his son. Note the Savior's reply: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." The man, in the intensity of his grief, exclaims: "Lord, come down ere my child die." Christ says: "Go thy way; thy son liveth." Now mark well what follows: "And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way." Every attentive Bible reader is acquainted with the result.

We had read this passage many times before without observing its true meaning, and without any conception of the exceeding comfort conveyed by it to the mind and heart of the weary soul longing for spiritual light. But now, having had the attention particularly directed to it, in our inquiries upon this (to us) perplexing subject, the simplicity of faith flashed upon us as it had never done before. We immediately exclaimed: "Why, it is simply taking God at his word, and believing it without any doubt or questioning."

Thereupon we reasoned thus: "Here we have been all along looking for 'signs and wonders.' We have the express declaration of Christ that 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' Here Christ does not say may not perish, but shall not. He gives us his most positive assurance. Well, what have we been doing? Instead of taking the bare, simple promise of God, and believing it implicitly, and, in obedience to his command, taking up our duties as a Christian, confiding in him with the same trust that a little child would repose in the word of his earthly father, we have, in effect, been saying: Lord, we believe this, we believe what you say, but we want some tangible manifestation, some 'sign' to prove to us that your word is true. We have thus been dishonoring God, and giving the most positive evidence of our disbelief." Reasoning thus, and being thoroughly convinced of our error, we resolved: "Lord, we will take thy bare word for our salvation. We believe it. We will endeavor, not in our own strength, but relying upon the atonement of our blessed Savior, to obey thy commandments, and if we do our duty we are firmly persuaded thou wilt keep thy promise. We will say, as did Job: 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him;' and we will do this, though we never should have a special manifestation as long as we live." Now how were we affected by this? Did we have any particular exhilition of feeling? Not at all. Did we have "that peace that floweth like a river?" We had not. We think we hear some good brother say: "Well, what on earth did you have?" We had this: We felt satisfied that we had surmounted the difficulty which had troubled us so long. We knew that we believed God. "Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness."—Galatians iii, 6. We had already made a complete surrender to God. We now believed that we were justified, and realized a fixed confidence that if we would continue to trust him and do his will, if we would wait on him, he would, in his own good time, abundantly bless and finally save us. Why? Simply because he said so.

We do not doubt that in many instances of conversion the subject experiences a change as perceptible to him or her as the shining forth of the sun from behind a black cloud after a storm, because they positively assure us that such was the case; and their blameless walk and the beauty of their Christian lives compel us to place confidence in what they tell us. But we believe these to be exceptional cases, and not the general rule; and we are firmly persuaded that to accept nothing short of this as an evidence of genuine faith is to hinder the cause of Christ. The effect is two-fold. Many are made to despair and give up the struggle; while, on the other hand, we fear not a few deceive themselves, and are induced, from undue excitement, to make a false profession, while destitute of simple, confiding trust in Christ; hence the sudden falling away of so large a proportion of those who make a profession of religion at our revivals.

Commencement Week at Baton Rouge.

A CITY OF SCHOOLS—DESIRABLE LOCATION—THE COMMENCEMENTS—THE STATE UNIVERSITY—READVILLA SEMINARY—THE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE—NEW ORLEANS PATRONAGE.

MR. EDITOR: This town may be no longer, as in ante-bellum days, the capital of the State; no longer, perhaps, shall it be the place in Louisiana where politicians most do congregate; but it is steadily acquiring distinction of another and better sort—it is becoming as truly a city of schools as Brooklyn is a city of churches. Schools abound here, and of every grade from the primary up to the university. Here are schools for boys and schools for girls, schools for whites and schools for blacks, schools public and private. We have here schools for the blind as well as for those who see, for the deaf as well as for those who hear, for the dumb as well as for those who speak. And certainly a more desirable site for the location of schools than Baton Rouge is seldom to be found. It is a remarkably healthy place, as is proven by the fact that Baton Rouge is distinguished in the list of United States army posts as the one where the least mortality occurs. Then it is readily accessible from all parts of the State, being situated immediately on the bank of the Mississippi, just below the confluence of the various rivers that traverse the larger portion of the State. It is a town, too, which abounds with evidences of cultivated taste, architectural and horticultural. What with lawns and trees and shrubbery so profusely mingling with the dwellings and other buildings, a bird's-eye view of the town gives it the appearance of an artistic grouping of cottages and mansions and churches and towering edifices in the midst of the foliage of a magnificent tropical garden.

As you may imagine, commencement week is a great occasion here—a sort of prolonged holiday among the people generally, though doubtless a prolonged agony for the graduating classes. The three leading educational establishments here have just held their commencements, and I will notice them in the order in which they were held.

THE STATE UNIVERSITY

occupies a splendid public edifice fronting the river, and is complete in all its appointments as a military school. Owing to the present condition of the State finances, as well as the lack of appreciation of educational interests among present-day Louisiana legislators, the usual appropriations have not been made to this university of late, and hence its sphere of usefulness has been greatly limited. This is one of the sad results of Federal displacement of Anglo-American for Africo-American mind in the government of Louisiana. The commencement exercises at the university were held on Wednesday last, and were quite interesting, though not at all up to the standard of university commencements. Next day was held the commencement of READVILLA SEMINARY.

This is a boarding and day school for girls, long established here, and of wide reputation in the State. Mrs. Read is the principal, and she has been assisted the past session by a full corps of very efficient teachers. The examination of the several classes in their various studies was open to the public, and was carried on for some days preceding commencement day. The visitor could not but be impressed with the high order and thoroughness of the culture at this school. I witnessed with great gratification the examination of the senior classes in moral and intellectual philosophy. The young ladies indicated an acquaintance with these studies that was extraordinary; nothing but the most faithful and efficient teaching could have produced such results. Rest assured of it, a diploma from Readvilla Seminary means something. I shall always have great respect for one who has obtained this distinction. The commencement exercises included the usual valedictory and other addresses by the graduates, some of which possessed much merit. The conferring of degrees upon several of the young ladies was impressively done by Prof. Magruder. Miss Annie Willis, a former graduate of the school, addressed the alumni in an utterance that was alike creditable to her mind and heart. The annual address to the graduates was delivered by W. H. Goodale, Esq., the city attorney. The theme was "Woman's Place in Science," and in a manner singularly felicitous did he demonstrate that woman was as much the complement of man in this sphere of learning as in the domestic sphere.

THE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

Prof. W. H. N. Magruder established and still continues to preside over this school. From the first it has taken rank as one of the best high schools in the United States. Pupils that have passed through the curriculum of this institute find ready entrance into all the principal colleges of the land; they are regarded as among the best trained young men they receive into their halls. This school is located in the suburban part of town, situated in the midst of spacious grounds and in the shadow of numerous towering oaks—a place very suggestive of academic shades. Last evening the annual exhibition at this school took place, and it was the crowning affair of the week. Over the main entrance was a brilliant arch of gas jets, and all over the grounds were lights of one sort or another; some suspended from branches of the overhanging trees produced a fine effect. The speakers' stand was run out from one of the side galleries of the main building, and was spanned in front with a spacious arch of globed gas lights. The lawn was filled with benches, and by eight o'clock the benches were filled by all Baton Rouge and the regions round about, who had assembled to witness the exercises. A fine silver band was in attendance, lending greatly to the entertainment of the occasion. Canopied with a clear, moonlit sky, and fanned with a breezy air, it was a night to enjoy outdoors uninterruptedly. One by one the young speakers came forward and delivered their pieces—some grave, some gay, some rousing the loftier emotions of the soul, and some exciting to laughter. An admirable variety for such an occasion. The boys acquitted themselves well, not in the ordinary stilted style of the sophomore, but with great naturalness and spirit; they evidently had a master, not a bungler, for their instructor. Some of the speakers did better than others, of course, and were applauded with showers of bouquets. Last of all Prof. Magruder made a brief address to the audience in his well-known pointed and incisive style, and then, with music sounding in their ears, the assemblage dispersed.

To-day the young men and young ladies that have been attending these schools from a distance are scattering out to their several homes; some going up the river to Woodville, Natchez, Vicksburg, Alexandria, Shreveport, Monroe, etc., others going down the river to Plaquemine, New Orleans, etc.

It does seem to me that if New Orleans families were generally acquainted with the character of these schools they would, more than they do, avail themselves of such excellent opportunity for the education of their sons and daughters. I doubt very much that there is a female college in the country which sends out graduates of a higher order of culture, mentally and morally, than Readvilla Seminary; and I am satisfied that there is no high school in New Orleans can compare with Prof. Magruder's for the quality of its scholarship. I am not alone in this opinion, for a clergyman of your city, well acquainted with the schools in New Orleans, and well qualified to judge of their merits, stated to me, not long since, after some observation of Prof. Magruder's school, that they had nothing equal to it in New Orleans. Some of your best citizens have found this out long since and send their sons here; surely it is for want of information concerning the school that many others do not likewise. The location is peculiarly desirable for the education of youth from New Orleans—so near, so accessible, so healthy. And, if parents only knew it, a boy makes much greater proficiency in his studies when away from home, under the direction of a faithful and efficient teacher during study hours as well as recitation hours, than when he is only under the control of the teacher during school hours. The reasons are obvious, and I need not point them out.

DATON ROUGE, LA., June 26, 1874.

SOME of our naturalists have fossilized brains. Every once in awhile we have a story of a giant or some other fossil found below all the records of creation as made by Moses. But the modern discoverers prove to be the mistaken ones, and some of them to be arrant cheats. A few days since it was stated that a fossil horse had been found down deep in the coal measures of Pennsylvania. Prof. O. C. Marsh, of Yale College, sends to the Tribune this amusing result of his examination of a specimen "bone" from the Pennsylvania wonder: "One of the hoofs of the 'fossil horse' found in Scranton, Pennsylvania, has been sent to me for examination. It turns out to be part of a calamite, a common fossil plant of the coal measures. I fear the horse did not inhabit Pennsylvania until a much later period." It is now time to try again.

Eyes Opened.

To the sincere seeker after truth there is a beautiful and impressive simplicity in the gospel narrative. The most hardened infidels have paid to it this tribute. It savors not of effort, much less of collusion. There are no points stiffly guarded or carefully sentineled, as if fearing a surprise and overthrow. There is an astonishing elasticity of applicability gathering about it, from the first to the last word. It moves along as a gently-flowing stream, giving health and comfort and greenness and freshness to the tender flower and sturdy oak. The most wonderful things are done and the most wonderful things are said without any grand flourish of introduction or preparation. There is a naturalness about it, as a spotless garment of white, that is as charming as it is convincing. It gradually reaches the denouement, which for grandeur and glory is only equaled by its conception. The great Teacher enforced his principles and announced his mission not by words only. Though speaking as never man spake, his actions were always in demonstration. His words were the words of God. His actions were the actions of God. They were all great. They are all above the law of contrast or comparison. Yet there were periods in his ministry, and circumstances clustering about some of his mighty works, that tend to enlist more sympathy and excite more interest than others. The case of the blind man is an instance in point. He excites our pity for his blindness, and our commiseration for his wretched poverty. But there are particular features in his case to which we refer. It would seem an accident that he sat and begged upon that particular road and at that particular time. It would seem a mere chance that Jesus passed that way. Humanly speaking, he did not know of the blind man at all. He did not know, as a man, that he was at that place. Evidently he would not have seen him but for his loud cries. The man would have remained in his blindness, and apparently one miracle less would have been given to the world. Jesus passing that way, was stopped by the poor man's loud cries. The throng gathering around him, he calls the man to him; did not go to the man; inquires of him his desires, which even as a man Jesus knew, and easily, naturally, graciously, grandly cures him of his malady. Here was an act of mercy to a poor wretched beggar—a mighty miracle wrought in full sight of the people, and a most impressive double lesson taught to all succeeding generations. There is no violence done to the spirit of God's word to consider this and all similar great cures as types of the wonderful spiritual change by which men are brought into the kingdom of Christ. They illustrate the new birth. Perhaps in no instance is the parallel more complete. To suggest a few points: In the first place, the man's condition excites attention. He was blind, physically. He was conscious of his condition. There is a spiritual blindness of which men are not conscious. None see so clearly and strongly. He had heard of Jesus, by which he had faith in his power to heal. Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. But there is a hearing that does not bring faith; rather unfaith, and finally death. This man's blindness rendered him unsafe, miserable, poor, and in some sense lonely and desolate. He had no sweet visions of father, mother, brother, friend; no sweet and lulling and restful visions of nature. Fortunately for him, he was conscious of his state, and knew the source of his relief. The physically blind man, unconscious of his deprivations, answers to the spiritually blind, impenitent, and without knowledge of or faith in Christ. But in every particular the blind beggar answers to the condition of the awakened, earnest, seeking penitent. This fact is further illustrated in the blind man's action. He inquired, he called, he importuned, he was humble, he overcame difficulties, he had faith. Antecedent to all this was a lively knowledge of his necessities. Without this, in the very nature of things, his subsequent action would have been impossible. Here are the clear, distinct features—the decided steps of the converted man or woman. No confidence in self, no reliance in an arm of flesh, conscious of ruin, and only relief in the Son of David. He passes by the spiritually blind beggar. In answer to the cry of faith, energized by intense suffering, he stops and calls and heals. Oh, what floods of soft, refreshing light come unto the soul at such a moment! How like Thomas, with all doubt and hesitation gone, the man cries: "My Lord and my God!"

The parallel is maintained, in a lively manner, in the blind man's (now blind no more) subsequent conduct. His acknowledgment was public. "Ye are the light of the world. Let your light so shine." He glorified God. It is not hard to imagine that he shouted aloud his praises. He followed Christ. There is something more in this than a literal physical following. The converted man follows him in his ordinances and commandments. "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken; abide in me and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me." If ye love me, keep my commandments. We are to glorify God in body and spirit; follow him publicly in all his will; acknowledge him in all our ways. He has done much for us in opening our eyes. We ought to do much for him. Lands, friends, wife, husband, children, father, mother, nay, even life itself, must not stand in the way of duty. Ye are not your own. Ye are bought with a price.

Obituaries.

DIED, at his residence near Downsville, Louisiana, January 7, 1874, MALCOM CALHOUN, aged fifty-one years, ten months and eighteen days.

The deceased united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Clarke county, Alabama, in 1846, since which he had lived the life of a meek and lowly Christian. Remarkable for an unostentatious and gentle demeanor, his piety was felt by others rather than seen. It may be truly said of him that when reviled he reviled not again, but returned good for evil. He left a wife and six children to mourn his irreparable loss. A kind and loving husband, an affectionate and indulgent father, a generous and sympathetic friend, his loss will long be felt. He feared not death, but spoke calmly and tranquilly of his approaching dissolution. He expressed himself as wishing to live for the sake of his family, yet willing to leave all in the hands of an all-wise and merciful God. A short time before his death he called his family around him, and gave to each his parting counsel, and invoked God's blessing on them.

His sufferings, at times excruciating, were borne with that Christian fortitude and resignation which ever characterizes the true follower of Jesus. He admonished his agonized wife not to grieve too deeply, but to meet him in that land where parting is no more. May God help the bereaved ones to bear this trial with patience, ever remembering that he fell asleep on earth, but to awaken in the bosom of his Savior. Yes, dear, good Cousin Make, thou art

"Asleep in Jesus! far from thee,
Thy loved ones and their graves may be;
But yours is still a blessed sleep,
From which you cannot wake to weep."

MRS. ANN BRANTLY departed this life at Hampden, Marengo county, Alabama, on the first of March, 1874.

She was the child of pious parents. Her father, Mr. Nathaniel Kimbrough, of Wilcox county, Alabama, aided by his devoted wife—both now resting from their earthly toils—reared her up, as they did all their children, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. They also taught her useful lessons in household duties, after the old style of attending to such things. Thus was she prepared to be truly a helpmate to Mr. Jonathan S. Brantly, to whom she was married in early life. Her early teachings were not lost sight of in her constant attention to domestic affairs. According to the faith of her parents, she cast in her lot with the Methodist Church, and lived and died a faithful member, serving God in newness of life.

For a number of years before she died she was the subject of much and sore affliction; but in all this her faith failed not. She knew in whom she had trusted, and that his promises were steadfast. The writer knew her long and well, and can say that he has no recollection of having ever seen a frown upon her face or heard a murmur from her lips. She possessed

"A heart resigned, submissive, meek
Her great Redeemer's throne,
Where only Christ was heard to speak,
Where Jesus reigned alone."

She died as she had lived, and, as if passing into a sweet sleep, departed for that place where the weary are at rest. If she had an enemy I know it not. Those who knew her loved her much. She leaves a husband, a daughter (an only child,) with many relatives to mourn their loss in her departure. To them all I would say: You know how she lived; you have seen how she died. "Go thou and do likewise." "Let your last end be like hers."

T. W. MATHEWS.

SISTER MARY DOUGLAS, daughter of Sion and Mary Herrington, was born in Moore county, North Carolina, February 27, 1802; was married to Silas Douglas October 20, 1818, with whom she lived for nearly fifty-six years. Three years after her marriage she was soundly converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, under the ministry of Rev. W. H. Crook, of the South Carolina Conference. From that time she "lived the life of the righteous." She was prompt to attend church, and uniform in her daily Christian life. She was the mother of nine sons and three daughters. Two of the sons died when quite young. Ten children were reared to manhood and womanhood. One son was slain in the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862. All the children were converted in early life—five of them at the home altar. This shows the truth and power of family religion. Three of her sons are now ministers of the gospel. One of them is a member of the Alabama Conference, the other two local preachers in the same Conference. She has one grandson who is a preacher of the gospel in the State of Georgia.

In 1857 Sister Douglas, with her husband and most of the family, moved to Alabama and settled near Orion, Pike county.

In 1866 Bro. Douglas became deeply concerned about holding a camp meeting. Several opposed and but few encouraged him in the work for some time. All the while, however, his wife gave him words of sweet cheer. She was willing and ready to do her whole duty in the matter. The camp was located between Troy and Orion, and the meeting embraced the fourth Sabbath in September, at which fifty-five souls were converted, and the church was greatly built up. This was the first camp meeting held in Alabama after the war; and she and her husband are entitled to the first honor because of this noble enterprise.

She was a woman of great self-possession and goodness of heart. Her stricken husband testifies that during their married life they never exchanged an angry word, and that he never saw her enraged. The writer lived in her house for three years, and bears cheerful testimony to her purity and sweetness of spirit.

A few years ago her husband disposed of his plantation and residence, and was spending his time with his children, and in "going about doing good." About two weeks before her death they came up from west Florida and lower Alabama to Troy, to spend some time with their children in that city.

For many years she had suffered from heart affection, and often remarked that she would soon depart this life, but gave assurance that she was ready. On the morning of June 16 she was as well as usual. She was occupying her room alone, taking rest. Her room was entered by a little granddaughter, and the grandmother bid her an affectionate "good-by." The little girl ran and told her mother and others, and when they entered the room Sister Douglas was so near gone that she was unable to speak, and in a few moments more the work was done, and her soul released to wing its hallowed flight to mansions of light.

At eleven o'clock, June 17, she was buried in the new cemetery in the city of Troy, Rev. W. H. Biggs officiating, as the pastor was absent. Many sorrowing friends and grief-stricken relatives followed her to her final resting-place on earth, and expect eventually to accompany her to the eternal city.

OZARK, ALA., June 22, 1874.

MRS. ELIZABETH HUDSON was born in Sumpter district, South Carolina, April 14, 1799, and died at her residence in Hinds county, Mississippi, April 13, 1874, and was buried on the anniversary of her birth, having outlived her threescore and ten years.

Sister Hudson's maiden name was Jones. She was first married to John Allen in 1817, and with him came to Mississippi, and settled in Wilkinson county in 1820. Thence they removed to Hinds county in 1823. Mr. Allen died in 1832, and she was married to Henry H. Hudson in 1835. She also survived her second husband, who died in December, 1866. Five children of her first and one of her second marriage yet survive their sainted mother.

Sister Hudson was a woman of more than ordinary physical constitution, and possessed also a strong and vigorous mind, and was noted for her stern religious integrity. She was religiously inclined from her childhood, but made no open profession of religion until 1833, when she professed conversion, and joined the Methodist Church at what is known as Bear Creek church, in Hinds county, and lived cotemporary with such eminent Christians of that neighborhood as the lamented Thomas Nixon and Thomas Griffin, and others of that class of Methodist people. Her character as a Christian and a Methodist was fashioned after the type of the former generation, marked by stability, consistency and earnest devotion to God, genial as a companion in all the relations of life, matronly in her intercourse with young Christians, assiduous in her attention to the comforts of her minister, and a model of every Christian virtue. She was a sufferer for twelve months before her death from disease and pain that words can feebly describe, but was only confined to her room for about three months. She bore her affliction with true Christian patience and resignation. As death drew near she grew rapturous with delight. She frequently expressed the most cheerful submission, and perfect confidence of a better life beyond the grave. The writer was her pastor nearly thirty years ago, and speaks advisedly of the virtues that adorned the character of this mother in Israel. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

MRS. MARIA E. WEEMS, the subject of this sketch, was born in Mount Sterling, Choctaw county, Alabama, October 25, 1852, and died at the residence of her father-in-law, Bro. Samuel Weems, in Smith county, Mississippi, April 15, 1874. She was the daughter of Maria and F. M. Dawkins. In 1859 her father came to Montrose, Mississippi, where he died in 1864.

She professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South at twelve years of age, and lived a consistent member of the same until her death. She was married to the Rev. J. M. Weems, of the Mississippi Conference, December 8, 1872, and in a little more than one short year left him with a heart well-nigh crushed by her untimely loss. The writer of this sketch knew her well, and had the pleasure of conducting the meeting at which she embraced religion, and of receiving her into the church. As a child she was modest and retiring, as a Christian devoted, as a wife affectionate. In her last sickness she was a great sufferer, but bore all her pain with Christian fortitude, only asking once or twice: "Why do I have to suffer so much?" She was often heard to pray: "Lord, make haste; take me to thyself." During paroxysms of pain she would repeat the Lord's Prayer with so much child-like simplicity that tears would involuntarily fill the eyes of those around her. She spoke of angels being in the room, and of hearing heavenly music, and, trying to clasp her poor, trembling hands, said: "I give my baby to the Lord." Then, kissing those around her, she closed her eyes, and her spirit took its flight to join the redeemed in glory. In losing Sister Weems the church has lost one of its brightest ornaments. She was a lady of fine mental culture, and would have graced any position in which she might have been placed. And while we miss her presence here, we will remember that she has "washed her robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Lo! the prisoner is released,
Lightened of her fleshly load;
Where the weary are at rest
She is gathered into God!
Lo! the pain of life is past,
All her warfare now is o'er,
Death and hell behind are cast,
Grief and suffering are no more.

WAIT AND SEE.

When my boy with eager questions,
Asking how and where and when,
Taxes all my store of wisdom,
Asking o'er and o'er again
Questions oft to which the answers
Give to others still the key,
I said, to teach him patience:
"Wait, my little boy, and see."

And the words I taught my darling
Taught to me a lesson sweet;
Once when all the world seemed darkened,
And the storm about me beat,
In the "children's room" I heard him,
With the child's sweet ministery,
To the baby brother's questions
Saying wisely: "Wait and see."

Like an angel's tender chiding
Came the darling's words to me—
Though my Father's ways were hidden,
Bidding me still wait and see.
What are we but restless children,
Ever asking what shall be?
And the Father, in his wisdom,
Gently bids us: "Wait and see."

Queen Ranavalona Victorious.

The large and beautiful Island of ndagascar, lying on the eastern ast of Africa, and separated from e main land by the channel of ozambique, has been the scene of range and marvelous changes of te. A few years ago the inhabit- ts were a wild, idolatrous people. he missionaries who undertook to read gospel truth among them were rtured to death or driven from the and.

The reigning queen thought she d exterminated Christianity in her gdom, but, like the leaven hid ay in the meal, the truth was retly working in the heart of r daughter, and when the queen- other died, and the young princess s elevated to the throne, she im- ediately declared herself a Chris- n.

On her coronation day, above the opy of the throne, were the sim- e, precious words, "Glory to God the Highest," and she was bap- ed. Immediately after her corona- n.

Shortly after the State idol-houses re thrown open, and the fences closing them broken down for a nfire, and the idols brought out d consigned to the flames in the sence of the priests and the people the capital.

When the "great idol" was brought t the priest said:

"You cannot burn him."

"We will soon see," answered one the chief men of the nation. "If s truly a god he will not burn."

The little bit of dry wood, bedecked h ribbons, was laid upon a ladle l held in the flames, that the peo- might see it burn. In a few mo- nts the worthless wood was re- ced to ashes and scattered to the r winds.

The priests bowed their heads and lked away sorrowful. But when e people appealed to the queen, hing: "You have taken away our ls; what shall we worship?" she l them of the religion of Jesus, and ployed teachers to make known ipture truth. Many schools have n established and churches built, l under the mild Christian lead- hip of Ranavalona her nation has n rapidly advancing in the arts Christian civilization. But there re barbarous, idolatrous tribes on coast, which have for some time eatened her peace and safety, and y recently a large army invaded territory.

he sent out two armies to meet m, and, after a battle which last- three days, the Sakalava or Coast es were completely conquered. en followed a remarkable scene, ich is communicated to the Lou- Friend by Louis Street. A Hova mander spoke to them thus: "I e authority from the queen, and osoever are against her I will fight u; but whosoever will obey her n give the kindness of the queen them. Now you submit to Rana- na, and I tell you this is her asure: that all her subjects serve living God; and you can find to serve the true God in this k. (A New Testament was shown.) y thanked the queen for her kind- s, and asked teachers to teach m how to read the book. Since decided victory the kings of go and Bara have sent messen- s to Queen Ranavalona, present- 'Nasina' as a sign of their sub- sion, and also to inquire about new religion, for they had heard t it is 'good.' The queen received m graciously, and gave them New taments, and told them about the gion of Jesus."

hus the Island of Madagascar, ich has an area of 232,316 square s and about 5,000,000 inhabitants, eing brought, under the leader- of this noble woman, to Chris- civilization.

Boro Prarthoneco.

rich Hindoo, who resided at nsurah, sent one day to the mis- aries to inform them that a very ned Brahmin was staying with , and that he should like the hmin and the missionaries to ar- about their religious. It was to friendly conversation about Hin- sm and Christianity. Two of the lemaries went.

he Brahmin began. He was a s, ill-tempered man; he evidently e under the influence of bad ngs. He said the missionaries e wicked men; and he made out r doctrines to be quite different what they really were. He said t he knew to be false; but he was y, and he wanted to set all his nds against the Christian teachers. he missionaries replied. They ed how their religion was full of ; how God loved the world by ing his Son; how that Son d sinners by dying for them; and the same feeling of love had ed the missionaries to leave their , their friends, their home, to peer Hindoos the way of salva- tion. They added much more; and all was spoken with kind looks and tones of affection, very different from the Brahmin's sour aspect and angry words.

Every one marked the difference. The Brahmin felt it himself; his countenance changed. He was not convinced by the missionaries' argument, but he was struck by their earnest love; and he could not help saying: "I am a Brahmin, and cannot allow that I think the Christian religion superior to mine; but I must allow that the temper of these Christians is superior to that of us Hindoos." And then the Brahmin added, turning to the missionaries: "Gentlemen, your temper is 'Boro Prarthoneco'—that is, greatly to be prayed for."

A striking remark, indeed, to fall from the lips of a Brahmin, and very full of instruction. It may remind us that if we would prove that ours is the true religion, and that we ourselves are truly religious, we must walk in love; for love, as an old writer expresses it, is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school and the livery of his family. And the Brahmin points out to us also the only way in which this love is to be obtained. He was quite right when he said it was much to be prayed for; for, like every good gift and every perfect gift, it comes down from above. Love to God and love to man is a fruit of the Spirit, and must by him be poured into the heart.

The Bible Immortal.

In the year 303, when that last great effort was made by the Emperor Diocletian to extinguish the Christian name, he sent on the twenty-third of February his legions to the great church of Nicomedia. When the doors were forced open and the soldiers entered, they searched and searched with diligence, but they searched in vain for any visible symbol of the Deity whom the Christians worshiped. No banners, no crucifixes, no images of the saints were to be found in any part of the building, noble though it was, and towering as it did, and, as historians tell us, above the very palace of the Cæsars. But as they searched they fell upon one record—upon one object on which they proceeded to vent their bitterest vengeance. They lighted upon the Scriptures of truth. They committed the Bible to the flames; and we all know, my friends, that that last great effort of satan to use pagan Rome as an instrument for annihilating Christianity was simply directed to the extermination of the sacred book. Now it strikes me that there are two very important lessons here. In the first place, do we not learn from the anecdote, or rather does not this anecdote remind us that the true test—the primitive test of the Christian church—is the sole supremacy of the Holy Scriptures of God?

But there is another lesson to be learned from that little anecdote, which I venture to bring to your memory, and that is that satan was wise in his generation when he bade the emissaries of pagan Rome direct all their efforts to the suppression of the Scriptures. You will remember that all the edicts that were fulminated at that time ordered the demolition of the Christian sanctuaries, that they called for the degradation of officers even in the highest posts of trust about the Imperial person, if they held and professed the Christian faith; but the virulence of all this animosity was directed against that little book which has for so many years, with God's increasing blessing, circulated to the uttermost parts of the earth. And why? Because the enemy knew well that so long as the Bible survives the church will live. The enemy knew well that so long as the Scriptures remain, full as they are, from Genesis to Revelation, of Jesus Christ and him crucified, the church will over and over again reassert her existence.—Bishop of Carlisle.

Curiosities of Animal Life.

There can be no doubt that dogs feel shame as distinct from, and something very like modesty, when begging too often for food. A great dog scorns the snarling of a little dog, and this may be called magnanimity. All animals feel wonder, and many exhibit curiosity, the latter quality affording opportunity for hunters in many parts of the world, to decoy the game into their power. The faculty of imitation, so strongly developed in man, especially in a barbarous state, is present in monkeys. A certain bull-terrier of our acquaintance, when he wishes to go out of the room, jumps at the handle of the door, and grasps it with his paws, although he cannot himself turn the handle. Parrots also reproduce with wonderful fidelity the tones of voice of different speakers, and puppies reared by cats have been known to lick their feet and wash their faces after the same manner as their foster-mothers. Attention and memory also are present in the lower animals, and it is impossible to deny that the dreams of dogs and horses show the presence of imagination, or that a certain sort of reason is also present. Animals also profit by experience, as any man realizes who sets traps. The young are much more easily caught than the old, and the adults gain caution by seeing the fate of those which are caught. Tools also are used by some of the higher apes. The chimpanzee uses a stone to crack a nut resembling a walnut, and the Abyssinian baboons fight troops of other species, and roll down stones in the attack before they finally close in a hand-to-hand encounter. The idea of propriety is common also to every dog with a bone, to all birds with their nests, and notably in the case of rooks. Nor can a certain kind of language be denied to the brutes. The dog communicates his feeling by barks of different tones, which undoubtedly raise in his fellow-dogs ideas similar to those passing in his own mind.—Edinburg Review.

As we pour water into a dry pump when we desire to obtain more, so must we have the love of Christ imparted to the heart before we shall feel any uprisings of delight in him.

The Land of the South Pole.

The open polar sea of Dr. Kane, and the line of land marked for thirty years on all our maps as running parallel with the Antarctic circle, were mysteries which excited the wonder and speculation of the world. In later years the existence of the one has been proven beyond doubt, and more recently the non-existence of the other has been established. In 1773-6 Captain Cook made his famous voyage, driving his ship as if to run crashing against the pole itself. Instead, he finally found himself in a kingdom of icebergs—nothing but ice barrenness on every side. The next southern voyage was made in 1833, and land was claimed to exist in latitude sixty-six degrees south. In 1839-40 three exploring expeditions cruised the southern seas. One vessel came upon a great volcano, pouring forth its flame and lava, making desolation more desolate. But with the American voyager went the unerring guide—Fortune. Captain Charles Wilkes discovered land in abundance within the bounds of the Antarctic circle. He cruised merrily along the shore, and gave names wonderfully appropriate to the varied peculiarities of this edge of the new world, of which Disappointment bay, Porpoise bay, Repulse bay and Termination Land are specimens. For thirty years, then, our children have been carefully taught, by their coddling teachers, of this important continent; to give its boundaries and tell its capes, inlets and mountains. John Bull, envious of the distinction, ignored the existence of the Wilkes Antarctic continent, determined that it should be discovered by some venturesome Englishman or not at all.

The investigations of the last ten years have prostrated many idols, and this one, dear to the constructor of American charts, has also fallen. The good ship Challenger has safely arrived in an Australian port, after a long and dangerous voyage of discovery among Antarctic icebergs. The commander, Lieutenant Hynes, sailed over the length and breadth of Wilkes' Antarctic continent, and found no trace of it except it was that which his lead struck at a depth of one and a half miles beneath the surface of the sea. With a cruelty which seemed almost malignant, he pursued his explorations far south even of "Termination Land," finding nothing but icebergs and an almost unfathomable sea.—Cleveland Leader.

An Incident of the Late London Mission.—The Church of England, as the Catholic Church, names its home revival meetings "missions." Of the recent revival in London a correspondent of the Western Morning News says: A lady was about to pass into Christ church, Albany street, when she noticed a very respectably dressed young person apparently hesitating whether she should go into the church or not. The lady spoke to her, and invited her to enter. The stranger replied that she would readily go in, but had no Bible. The lady said: "I will lend you my Bible with pleasure; pray come with me to my seat." They both went in. The young person, who might have been a governess, paid particular attention to the service, and read the Bible apparently with great earnestness. When the service was over the lady asked her to accept the Bible, in which her own name was written. The following morning the lady, who was a visitor at one of the great hospitals, went to the institution to pay her usual visit. On arriving there the nurse said: "O madam, we have a Bible in which your name is written, that belongs, perhaps, to you." The lady, somewhat surprised, asked how she got it; upon which the nurse told her that on the previous night a young person had been brought in seriously injured, who had been knocked down by a cab or carriage. The surgeon in attendance found that the injuries were mortal, and told her that she had not long to live; upon which the young person exclaimed: "Oh, thank God, I did not die before last night!" mentioning at the same time that she had been to the church, and had received great benefit from what she had heard there. Soon afterward she expired.

Japanese Census.—The census of Japan for the year 1872 has just been published, and contains many interesting and some curious items of information. From it we learn that the total population of the island is 33,110,825, of whom 16,796,158 are males and 16,314,687 are females. Of this number 14 are princes, 15 princesses, 2,666 of noble birth; while of Buddhist priests, priestesses and nuns there are no fewer than 221,467. The Shinto priests and priestesses number 102,477, and the "common people" are put down at 30,837,271. Among these "common people" it is curious to notice the very large proportion of women who are engaged in various trades and occupations. For instance, out of the total number of 14,870,426 farmers, 6,866,412 are females; and 489,409 merchant offices are presided over by women as compared with 819,782 which have men as masters. It is plain, therefore, that women in Japan are not suppressed as they are in most Eastern countries; and the criminal statistics show that, compared with the men, they are as honorably free from crime as they are diligent in the pursuit of lawful occupations. The criminals in the prison are said to number 2,430, of whom only 119 are females; while the numbers at the penal settlements are 962 and 26, and at hard labor 2,726 and 320. It is impossible to suppose that these figures even approximately represent the number of criminals in Japan. If they did they would yield the truly astonishing result that out of a population of more than 33,000,000 only 1 in 5,500 is an offender against the law, and they would show that Japan is a more truly civilized country than England, with all its Christian agencies and institutions.

The London Times contains correspondence from the famine districts in India up to the middle of April. At that time the government was feeding one and a half millions of people in Bengal, Benares and Oude, and the number was growing with every week. In North Gurrukpore a ride of fifteen miles showed a country bare as the palm of the hand, with only a slight fringe of vegetation around the cottages, where it had been maintained by irrigation. Bands of farmers were continually met emigrating with their families toward government relief, further south. The district of Tirhoot seems to be the center of the distress. As usual, time was lost at the beginning; but for three months the government, from the viceroy, Lord Northbrook, down to the lowest English officials, has been fighting the famine with the utmost energy. Vast quantities of rice and grain have been hurried into the afflicted districts, by means of a railroad hastily built to Durbunga, and by ox-teams, which have, however, suffered sorely for want of water. Public works employing large numbers of people have been instituted, a system of village relief perfected, food-houses opened at many places, and granaries within easy access of every village. The dishonesty of the working people, who evade the labor for which the government pays them, and the indifference of the higher classes of natives to the sufferings of the lower, stand in painful contrast with the energy of the British officers. One of the latter, who, having ridden all day under the fierce sun, rises in the evening from his rest to right a poor native to the pittance of rice out of which he had been cheated by false weight, is a fair specimen of what these men are doing as a class. Thus far they have kept even pace with the famine, and scarcely more have as yet died from want in India than die from the same reason in London; while in 1866, in Orissa alone, half a million died of hunger, and in the famine of 1770 ten millions perished. The mission stations do not appear to be greatly affected, though the Church Missionary Society and the English Baptist have raised considerable famine funds to assist their converts as far as may be necessary.—Independent.

Force of Gravity.—It is not usually considered how animal and vegetable life on our planet is adapted in exact relation to the force of gravity. Had the earth been a little larger or smaller, things would have been somewhat different. As regards the vegetable world, this is interestingly put by Whewell: "As an instance of the adaptation between the force of gravity and forces which exist in the vegetable world, we may take the positions of flowers. Some flowers grow with the hollow of their cups upward; others 'hang the pensive head,' and turn the opening downward. The positions, in these cases, depend upon the length and flexibility of the stalk which supports the flower, or, in the case of the euphorbia, the germen. It is clear that a very slight alteration in the force of gravity, or in the stiffness of the stalk, would entirely alter the position of the flower-cups, and thus make the continuation of the species impossible. We have, therefore, here a little mechanical contrivance, which would have been frustrated if the proper intensity of gravity had not been assumed in the reckoning. An earth, greater or smaller, denser or rarer, than the one on which we live, would require a change in the structure and strength of the foot-stalks of all the little flowers that hang their heads under our hedges. There is something curious in thus considering the whole mass of the earth, from pole to pole, and from circumference to center, as employed in keeping a snow-drop in the position most suited to the promotion of its vegetable health."

Sources of Power.—What wood and water are to the steam engine, food is to the body. By the burning of the wood water is converted into steam, and that gives power. By the consumption of food and its digestion power is given to the body to work and the brain to think. As there is more heat in some woods than others, so there is more "strength" or power or nutriment in some kinds of food than in others. If persons have to "work hard" bodily, or have to think intensely, they must eat more than if they did not labor much or think much.

Great thinkers are great feeders, as Count Cavour, Prince Bismarck, Charles Sumner, Henry Ward Beecher and Daniel Webster. Observant men, who have had large numbers of workmen in their employ, have long since noted the fact that the most work could be got out of those who had the best appetite.

Hence, to study easily—that is, to get lessons easily—children and college students should eat heartily, and if they will only eat at three regular times daily, and nothing between meals of plain, nourishing food, there is very little danger of eating too much, and there is a reasonable certainty of their having good health, and becoming efficient students and fine scholars. The time may come when persons will order their food with a view to the amount and character of the labor to be performed.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Will you say that there are no real stars because you sometimes see meteors fall, which for a time appeared to be stars? Will you say that blossoms never produce fruit because many of them fall off, and some fruit which appeared sound is rotten at the core? Equally absurd is it to say there is no such thing as real religion because many who profess it fall away, or prove to be hypocrites in heart.—Payson.

As the Lord's mercies are new every morning, so those to whom they come have a perpetual freshness of life untouched by the burden and heat of the day.

It is almost impossible to state any truth strongly without seeming to conflict with some other truths.—Emerson.

Religious Intelligence.

John Getty, Esq., has bequeathed $250,000 to the missions of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

A new Joss-house was recently dedicated in Weaverville, California, with the most imposing Chinese ceremonies.

The Roman Catholic Society for the Propagation of the Faith has an income which last year amounted to $1,104,838.

France is going to be full of pilgrimages this year. No less than seven are said to be down on Roman Catholic programmes.

The Moravian Church has one out of every fifty of its communicants engaged in the mission service, and for every member at home nearly three members in the mission-field.

In six months the ministry of the Reformed Episcopal Church has increased from one to almost twenty, and the membership of the churches from four persons to thirteen hundred.

On March 29 the Presbyterian church at Rio Janeiro was dedicated. A pleasant feature of the occasion was the presence of the Southern Presbyterian missionaries from Campinas. The church seats 600, and has cost $40,000, which has been raised. The congregation numbers 140.

Rev. Dr. Moffatt, the father-in-law of the late Dr. Livingstone, the African traveler, has been a missionary laborer fifty-three years in Africa, and is described as a venerable old man, with a white beard, and of great interest in whatever concerns the spiritual education and elevation of the African people.

The most marked feature of the mission work among the Kaffirs at the present time is the progress made in the higher schools. The Lovedale Institution of the Free Church has been already described in our columns. Toward the foundation of a branch of this high school the heathen tribe of Fingoe have recently contributed nearly $7,500.

English Wesleyans have recently established a mission in Munich, Bavaria. They have some 18 or 19 preachers in the German work (chiefly in Wurtemberg,) 184 preaching places, 40 Sunday schools, and 2,006 members and probationers. The superintendent of the work, J. C. Barratt, edits the Methodisten Herold, a semi monthly paper devoted to the interests of the work.

A "Traveling Scholarship" has been established in Union Theological Seminary, the interest of which, $700, is to enable the successful competitor of the graduating class to travel and study for two years in foreign and Bible lands. It is not very surprising, therefore, to learn that about half the next class has entered the lists for this tempting prize. Now, as only one student can get it, perhaps the rest can be induced to travel in Bible lands at home instead, and give their congregations a little more of biblical and a little less of doctrinal preaching, and in this way meet the unsatisfied need of the times.

Pastor Modak, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at Ahmednuggor, thus speaks of two visits made by him to Allahabad: "At the close of 1872 I enjoyed the privilege of attending the Missionary Conference at Allahabad, as a delegate from this mission. Thirty-eight years before I visited the same place as a Hindoo, in company with my father, to obtain merit by the ceremonies there performed. Now I came again, a Christian minister, to meet at this place of pilgrimage other ministers of Christ. Most wonderful and impressive to my heart seemed the providence of God which had brought me there again, so changed. After the Conference I went on to the northeast and visited Birhoor, where, forty years before, as a child, I had played with 'Nana Sahib.'"

We have received the third annual evangelization report of the Free Church in Italy, with which the well-known Gavazzi is prominently connected. The evangelization work of this church is almost exclusively supported by Christians in other lands. The income for 1873 was $34,000, of which sum America contributed $6,000. The report mentions 33 stations, with 21 evangelists, a large number of schools, and, as nearly as we can ascertain, 815 communicants. The report has no statistical table, and the figures do not appear to be carefully given. The strongest church is that at Milan, with about 300 members. The affairs of the church are conducted under the General Assembly, by an evangelization committee, of which Rev. John McDougal, of the Scotch Church, Florence, is the treasurer.

The Missionary Herald reports two remarkable cases of conversion at Tang Feng, in the North China mission. Two Chinese had left their homes five weeks before, carrying burdens, to avoid suspicion or detention. They had, to use their own language, "gone forth searching for a way whereby they might be saved." They had known nothing of Christianity, but felt oppressed with a sense of sin and need. After traveling 400 miles they fell in with one of the mission colporteurs, from whom they heard the gospel. Stopping with him over night, they kept his company the whole of the next day, inquiring about the salvation in Christ. They could only remain with the missionary a week; as they had promised that, if ever they came home again, it would be within two months. Ere they left they were baptized and went on their way rejoicing.

A clergyman in Wales has been preaching against the practice of purchasing church livings. He alleges that 6,600 parishes in England have thus been made a subject of purchase and sale, and this is the way it works: "A boy rector, for instance, or a weak-headed one, comes down from Oxford to fill the incumbency of a large and populous parish. He introduces all sorts of gimcrackeries, genuflects to the altar, bows to the host, burns incense, lights candles, prays to the Virgin, kisses the crucifix, and drives the old parishioners perfectly wild with his mad Romish tricks. Yet there is not a soul among them that can prevent him. The nominee of some great man, he is perfectly safe in his cure. It has been bought and paid for. Every soul there is his by law established, to cure and to bless in the way he thinks most fit."

News comes which seems to verify the telegraphed report of the murder of thousands of Roman Catholics in China, in the canton of Quinlin-Dol. The massacre commenced February 24, and the Christians were beheaded, drowned and hunted with blood-hounds, until it is estimated that 10,000 persons were slain. If all the facts alleged should prove true, it will be set down in history as the most horrible butchery ever perpetrated. It appears that the military and civil authorities of the canton were in full sympathy with the bloodthirsty populace. The event will be investigated by European nations, and punishment exacted, probably from the decks of the combined war vessels of the civilized world.

The Protestant missionary work in Siam is carried on by the American Presbyterian Church, the Baptist Union now confining its labors to the Chinese emigrants in that country. As in all Buddhist communities, the field has been a difficult one. Thirteen years elapsed before the baptism of the first convert. There are now 3 churches and about 60 native Christians. At Chiengmai, the capital of North Laos, two of the earliest converts suffered martyrdom in 1869. Nearly the whole Bible has been translated into Shinese, and has, with other books and tracts, been widely circulated. There is a school for boys at Bangkok and one for girls at Petchaburi. The Romish Church claims to have upward of 7,000 converts. Many of them are descendants of Portuguese settlers.

The final action of the Presbyterian Assembly (North) on the consolidation of the boards was this: The Foreign Mission Board continues as it is; the Home Mission will also include the sustentation fund for pastors; the freedmen's committee will remain separate for five years, and then be merged into the Home Mission Board; the board of church erection will remain as it is; the board of publication will remain as at present, and shall also supervise the whole Sunday school work of the church; and the board of education and the relief fund committee are not to be changed, but they are to have but one treasurer. In view of these changes, the Assembly "ordered" that the following shall be the list of causes for which the churches are required to make contributions, either by specific collections or by systematic apportionment: Foreign and home missions, sustentation, education, missionary work of the publication board, church erection, ministerial relief and the freedmen.

Not only have the Lutherans just dedicated a beautiful church in Washington, says the Christian Union, but they have made it in quite a unique way a memorial of peace and fellowship between the North and South. At the close of the services memorial offerings were made, when a number of the contributors preferred to designate some name to be inscribed upon certain pews. The conception was a happy one, for, after pews had been set apart in the names of prominent Lutheran divines, living and dead, some one gave $50 to have an Abraham Lincoln pew, another Charles Sumner, another General Grant, another General Lee, another General Ekin, of the South, and still another a General Howard pew, and thus, says the Lutheran Observer, "side by side are placed the names of men who have fought battles, ecclesiastical and civil, and at the head of them all John Calvin, Luther and John Wesley. The Memorial church is a memorial of peace and not of war. It will have healing power in the capital of the nation, midway between North and South."

The American Board, Presbyterian, have appointed two more missionaries for Mexico. Rev. G. F. G. Morgan, of Vallejo, California, will proceed without further delay; Mr. Edwards and his wife will go in the autumn. The board have received a communication from Secretary Fish, of the Department of State, inclosing a dispatch from Mr. John W. Foster, United States minister in Mexico, relating to the assassination of Mr. Stepheus. Previous to the date of his writing, seven of the guilty parties had been tried and condemned to death, but appealed from this sentence to the Supreme Court. Twelve or fifteen more, charged with complicity in the crime, are under arrest awaiting trial, including the cure of Ahualulco, the parish where the murder was committed. President Lerdo, in an interview recently given to the Protestant missionaries resident in Mexico, declared it to be his determination to use every means in his power to secure the punishment of the assassins and to protect the Protestant missionaries in the free exercise of their labors.

The "Christians" of Virginia, North Carolina and other Southern States—an evangelical organization numbering about 12,000 communicants—in General Convention assembled, the first week in May, at Graham, North Carolina, have issued a circular address and manifesto, proposing union and co-operation with all evangelical believers in Christ. They claim that the Church of the Strangers in New York, of which Rev. Dr. Deems is pastor, and the Church of the People in Brooklyn, of which Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost is pastor, have been organized on the same principles which govern their organization in the South. The creed of these "Christians" is in the exact language of the Scriptures, and requires assent only to those fundamental doctrines held in common by all evangelical organizations. Rev. W. B. Wellons, D. D., of Suffolk, Virginia, editor of the Christian Sun, their organ, is president of their General Convention, and will be pleased to correspond with individual Christians, independent local churches, and other religious organizations seeking the union of a new divided church, and the union of believers in feeling, worship and work.

The Comforter.

The Paraclete of John has doubtless other meanings than Comforter. Patron, helper, advocate, teacher, sanctifier and even other offices may be included. But Consoler lies in them all, and is a property common to them all. Comfort is the result as felt in the believing heart. Relative to Christ the Holy Ghost is "another Comforter," and takes his place in consoling and strengthening the disciples. The early Christians are represented as walking "in the comfort of the Holy Ghost." In a world of trouble and in a life of suffering there is need of comfort. It is the cry of the human race, the yearning of humanity. There may be no clear recognition of spiritual things, no act of faith in reference to the promises of the gospel, but there is a sense of misery and want. In the distressing trials of the world there is a lack in all human help. Job was perhaps peculiarly unfortunate in his friends, and the perplexed patriarch may have been a little rash in his speech when he exclaimed: "Miserable comforters are ye all." It is, however, too true of the best-intended efforts to counsel and sympathize with the afflicted.

This divine Comforter is capable of knowing and of reaching every case. The root of every individual sorrow is clear to him, and he is wise to apply the balm. The right thing for consolation is often beyond the comprehension of human friendship.—There are temptations and sorrows which one human spirit can never tell to another. In nothing else are good and benevolent people such bunglers as in their attempts at cheering and helping the afflicted. They can do something, and their work is Christ like, and such as angels may envy. They make grievous mistakes, notwithstanding, often opening the wounds they would heal, and sometimes plunging the objects of their sympathy into deeper despair. The mother is at her wit's end in the endeavor to quiet her troubled child. There is abundance of love and pity, and tenderness also, but there is a depth and mystery in the workings of sorrow, and a delicacy in the anatomy of grief, which defies the almost preternatural insight of affection. The Comforter is liable to no such embarrassments. He can make no mistakes; by no rough and blundering touch can he wound where the office of healing is required.

There is a fullness of resources in his ministry of comfort. "Who comforteth us in all our tribulations." Not for one or several kinds of affliction, but for all he is sufficient. If the mind be perplexed with worldly affairs, if the heart be saddened and broken with bereavement, if mystery and darkness obscure the faith, if the cloud of condemnation and fearfulness hang over the conscience, we have in him an Advocate and a Guide. He comes alike to the young in their peculiar temptations and difficulties, and to the aged in the wintry desolation and solitude of their years. To the child of God in the hour of depression, struggling with the waves and billows of satanic devices, or well-nigh overwhelmed with misfortune, he comes as a timely helper. To the sinner in his penitence seeking for pardon, groping for something in which to rest, he is present to guide into all truth, to teach as no human words can, and to breathe into him the life of faith.

He is the Comforter. All other agents and appliances are accessory, and, apart from him, of little value. The afflictions and sufferings of the whole world, in their terrible variety, in their manifold and agonizing manifestations, in their depths and expansion, in their wails and groans and sickening cries, are taken in by him at a glance. Over this mass of writhings and anguish, this scene of woe and tears, the blessed Spirit hovers, and goes down into the abyss of wretchedness and misery on his mission of healing and mercy. The Christian alone may be distinctly conscious of the Comforter's presence, and feel the complete helpfulness of his grace; but who can tell to what extent these beams of gladness are scattered everywhere? We can well imagine that this ministry of consolation is that in which the Spirit most delights. He would fain help all. He would come into the darkest and most distressed souls, and set up a paradise in the guiltiest heart. He strives not alone to reprove and to awaken, and to exhibit the loathsomeness of sin and the peril of the sinner. He does this that he may lead the soul away from ruin, and bring it to the realization of peace and assurance forever. He knocks at every door of sorrow, he waits at every desolate fireside, he nestles near to every anxious and distracted breast. His most joyous, his chosen ministry is to comfort.

Necessary as are the severe and afflictive dispensations of Providence, and inseparable as trouble is from this sinful earth, it is the mission of the Spirit to follow in the path of the storm, and to bring blessing and glory out of the seeming wreck. Suffering has its divinely appointed purpose, but without the office of the Comforter it would altogether fail of its end. The sharp surgery of discipline, to be wholesome, must be accompanied by the soothing ointment and the curative skill of the physician. It is for afflicted souls to remember this. The Comforter is always near the scene of conflict, always at hand in the supreme moment of trial, and seeking ever to sanctify the trial and to sustain us under it. The shortest and most effectual way to comfort others is to direct them to the Comforter. Experience in spiritual things, and fellowship in the common sufferings of our kind, qualify us to cheer the sorrowful. But we shall be most helpful by pointing the weary to this divine Helper, and by leading the oppressed and burdened spirit to the Comforter. The Christian's highest title is that of "a son of consolation." In this work he realizes the most perfect fellowship of the Holy Spirit, and becomes a co-worker with him in his great and distinctive mission. The connection of this thought expounds one of Paul's most luminous and instructive paragraphs: "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God."

The Ultimatum.

Dr. Kennedy, of the Southern Christian Advocate, takes the following notice of Dr. Curry and fraternity:

"The editor of the New York Christian Advocate (Dr. Curry) has discovered an ultimatum in the report on fraternity adopted by our General Conference. He does not at all like the report. 'Twould be strange if he did! Perhaps an outright and downright surrender would please him for awhile. Perhaps if the Church South were to disband that would please him. He says:

"The delegates that shall come to us two years hence—if they come at all, which seems scarcely probable after what has occurred—must come with a flag of truce, bringing stern and far-reaching demands—the ultimatum of an unfriendly power—which it is impossible that we should comply with; and so, of course, the old attitude of unfriendliness must remain."

Let us inquire what that ultimatum is. This is important, for the "great official" of Northern Methodism tells us it cannot possibly be complied with, and that ends negotiations. Before we look for it in the majority report, let us see if this ultimatum can be found in the resolutions adopted (nem. con.) on the last day of the General Conference, and brought forward mainly by those who were understood to favor the minority report. This may be the offending resolution:

"That we are also a unit upon the propriety of appointing a commission empowered to meet a like commission from the Methodist Episcopal Church to settle all questions of difficulty between us, and that such settlement is essential to complete fraternity."

Does the belligerent editor stickle at these conditions? Would he have these "questions of difficulty" left unsettled? Would he require us unconditionally to embrace fraternity?

Like enough, he wishes no commission. As chairman of the committee in the General Conference of Brooklyn, which brought in the resolutions appointing fraternal messengers to us, it is understood that he withdrew that portion of the report which looked to the settlement of questions of difficulty between the two Methodisms.

Let us explore the report that has gone out into all the world, and become a historic document, and let us find in it, if we can, the ultimatum which cannot be complied with by Northern Methodists.

Perhaps it is here: Our General Conference mentions the Plan of Separation of 1844, with great respect, and gives the very best reasons for it.

Is it impossible for the New York official, and these it represents, to allow this, and at the same time to accept fraternal relations? It has been the habit of some Northern writers to spit on that plan, or to spit at it. They speak and write of it as one of the relics of slaveocracy; one of the vestiges of a government that was ruled by the old slave power; one of the decisions of a supreme court that did the mean work of Southern masters, etc.

Such driveling immorality may suit smaller men, but surely the leader of the Northern Methodist press cannot stoop so low. Loyal men must bow to the decisions of the highest court in the country. To stigmatize that court as unreliable and unworthy of respect would be to defy all civil law. How much in the North, East and West—to say nothing of the South—how much in property and various forms of right and possession stands on the decrees of the same Supreme Court of the United States that adjudicated the Plan of Separation, and declared our rights under it?

Pardon us, Mr. Editor of New York, but we cannot give up all rights for fraternity. In 1848 and 1850, and 1869 and 1870—whenever that subject has been mentioned by us—it was mentioned in connection with the status and rights guaranteed to us under the Plan of Separation.

Declare that plan null and void, and we have no rights in property acquired before 1844. Our share of the Book Concern was a legal fraud, and ought to be returned, principal and interest, if the Plan of Separation is not a valid instrument. Then we are a secession and not a legitimate branch of the Methodism of 1784.

Is it "impossible" for our Northern brethren to hear of that plan with composure, or to acknowledge any rights we have under it? Then we had as well know it; and the sooner the better.

Perhaps the ultimatum which Dr. Curry discovers in that report is herein: It declares that their treatment of the negro problem is different from ours. They have anticipated the civil rights bill, and inaugurated "mixed Conferences, mixed congregations and mixed schools." The report says plainly that we like our plan better, and "could not adopt theirs." Is that the offensive condition which the "great official" of Northern Methodism insists on? Must we adopt their plan of mixed Conferences, mixed congregations and mixed schools, or else have no fraternity?

In the next number of the New York Christian Advocate, following that from which our text is taken, there is a long and earnest leading editorial in favor of the passage of the civil rights bill. No degradation seems to be low enough for us in the estimation of Dr. Curry. No humiliation inflicted upon them seems to satisfy his hatred of the South and of Southern white people. How he would like to see a colored presiding elder over the Columbus district, or our female colleges opened and occupied by black and white alike! Would it not rejoice the doctor to see his old Georgia Conference well mixed?

Well, we have declared against that policy. We have taken our position. Call it an ultimatum, if you please. Are we given to understand that it cannot be allowed if we have complete fraternity with them?

Verily, we are at a loss to find out what that one thing is, that clause, that item in the report, which is characterized as an impossible ultimatum, deliberately thrown by us in the way of fraternity.

Perhaps it is this, and this exhausts supposition: We do candidly declare that organic union is no part of our purpose. Does this offend them? Do they desire fraternity, not for itself alone, but as something leading to something else—to union? Is that their aim and object—union, to be brought on by fraternity? When we rule out union, is this the ultimatum that cannot be complied with?

The New York editor rolls up his sleeves and goes at it again. He does dislike so much to fight! It grieves him to the heart that the "old attitude of unfriendliness" must be kept up! He has done what he could, all the time, to make peace! Alas, for us! Now the policy of "disintegration and absorption" may take a fresh start.

One thing is certain: If ever there is fraternity between the two Methodisms, Dr. Curry, of the New York Christian Advocate, will not help to bring it about.

The Plan of Separation.

It was thought by some to have been a needless and unwarrantable thing, on the part of our General Conference, to have made any reference to the Plan of Separation. That it is no dead and impracticable issue between the two Methodisms is evident from the following case lately decided in a Tennessee court. The Greenville (East Tennessee) Union of June 11 has this news:

In Chancery Court at Jonesboro, last week, an important church suit was decided by Chancellor Smith. The property in dispute was the Brush Creek camp ground property—some four acres of land on which there is a parsonage building. The property is in the suburbs of Johnson City, and is of itself valuable. The land was deeded in 1811 to the Methodist Episcopal Church for a camp ground. It passed to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, as this church claims, by the Plan of Separation of 1844, from which time, until the close of the war, that church held it, having in the meantime erected on it a parsonage. In 1865 some of the trustees of the Church South, having gone to the Church North, put the property into the possession of the latter, which created a board of trustees to hold the property. The suit was decided in favor of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and rents allowed from the date of the filing of the bill. This is the only church suit between these churches, yet tried, in which the property was decided before the separation of 1844, and hence is important, as the final decision of it will determine a whole class of suits. The trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court, and signify their intention, if they lose in that court, if possible, to carry the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States.

THE first number of Our Missionary has just come to hand. It is neatly printed, and edited with taste and judgment. Such information as our people need concerning the missionary work of the Southern Church is contained in the paper. It is the thing we have wanted for a long time to inform and quicken the church, and to place the cause of missions where it legitimately belongs—in the van of all our religious enterprises. It is by eminence the work of the church, and it is fitting that a monthly publication should be exclusively devoted to its advocacy. Let Our Missionary be put in the hands of all our members, and there will be a broader and more intelligent piety, and a deeper consecration. Respecting reinforcements and China the editors say:

Long time our missionaries in China have been calling for help. We have not sent a missionary to China since 1860. For years the war and its consequent disasters hindered us. But really it is time to look out a new excuse, unless we intend to abandon our missionaries. Our Southern people may never be very rich again, but we are rich enough to do our duty, if we only will do so. A church need not have great wealth to do good missionary work.

Dr. Kelley is right in his admirable essay when he says: "The largest contribution, in proportion to numbers and wealth, we have found in poor churches and in mission fields. Missionary education and systematic giving are the keys to this result."

In 1872 the Texas Conference averaged fifty-four cents per member in the collection for missions. Had all done as well, we would have raised that year, in the entire church, over $300,000, instead of less than $100,000. Surely all can do as well as Texas did. We can raise money enough to send a dozen missionaries to China if we use the means.

Can we not send out at least two recruits this year? Where are the men? Are they ready? Who says: "Here am I; send me?"

We have a letter from one of our missionaries in China—Mrs. J. W. Lambuth. It was not designed for publication, and we will not publish it. But one paragraph we must give our readers.

Mrs. Lambuth says: "My work lies among children and their mothers. There is much to be done among old and young; and if the board would only send more men and women to share in this great work, we would greatly rejoice."

We commend our sister's words to the Board of Missions, and to the six hundred and seventy-six thousand six hundred Southern Methodists they represent.

God has opened "a great and effectual door" for our church in China. Will we go through it into the broad fields beyond? A missionary farewell is greatly needed in our church just now. It would re inspire the church, as well as rejoice the hearts and strengthen the hands of our missionaries in China.

IN THE sketches of our Bishops, which we copied from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, there was manifest injustice done to Bishop Doggett. We know the writer well, and have no doubt that it was unintentional. Bishop Doggett's position and character need no vindication. As a preacher there are none more finished and eloquent than he. We have been with him in the cabinet, and only to admire his patience, urbanity and excellent judgment in this most trying work of a Methodist Bishop. As a presiding officer we have found him always most satisfactory. We most heartily indorse the words of Dr. Summers, in the Nashville Christian Advocate, who says:

Our correspondent, "M. M." enters the field in defense of Bishop Doggett against a depreciating remark in an article which we copied from the Pittsburg Christian Advocate. Well, we thought our caveat was sufficient. Bishop Doggett has a national reputation as facile princeps in the pulpit, and a capital executive officer in the episcopal chair. We have been with him at Annual and District Conferences, as well as the General Conference, and have been delighted, as we have often expressed it, with his masterly manner of doing business. We have been especially struck with his festina lente method. He gets through in good time—slights nothing, and is never in a hurry. Our friend of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate—for he does not seem to be an enemy—must have been napping when the Bishop was presiding at the General Conference, for everybody else knows that he held us all well in hand when he was in the chair. Our correspondent need not be nervous for the fair fame of the Bishop. He is sans peur et sans reproche, and we most devoutly thank the Head of the church for giving him to us. But enough—too much perhaps for a trifle worth only a smile.

A Christian Hero.

The brief code of rules adopted by Dr. Kane, the Arctic explorer, for the government of the Grinnell Expedition in search of Sir John Franklin and his men, was characteristic of his moral heroism and religious principle. They were these: 1. Implicit obedience to the instructions of the commander. 2. Total abstinence from intoxicating liquors unless medically prescribed. 3. Entire disuse of profane language by every member of the expedition.

The restless daring of his nature, his scientific ardor and skillful training for great emergencies, were blended with those gentler impulses of a refined sensibility which fitted him to govern rougher men, and to triumph over obstacles which few would have willingly encountered. Humanity and science wept together over his early grave. But he went down to its deep sleep without a fear and without regret. He had climbed the steep of fame, and from its summit looked calmly out upon an admiring world. And when, after long illness, his time had come, he breathed his life away to the sweet music of the twenty-third Psalm of David, and passed "through the gate into the city," while his tender mother was reading our Savior's words: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions." What a Pisgah was that death-bed to his departing spirit!

The power of his example shines amid the noblest records of human heroism. To American youth it may well become an inspiration in these times of fast living and of profane unbelief. He seemed almost afraid lest the Arctic snows and solitudes should be desecrated by the drunkenness and oaths of any of his men.

And nobly did he lead where he asked them to follow. Materialism, in which some modern scientists find their last retreat from a personal God, had no place in him who thus wrote:

"I have trodden the deck and the floes when the life of earth seemed suspended, its sounds, its colorings, its companionship; and as I looked on the radiant hemisphere circling above me, as if rendering worship to the unseen center of light, I have ejaculated in humility of spirit: 'Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him?'"

And again: "A trust based on experience, as well as on promises, buoyed me up at the worst of times. Call it fatalism, as you ignorantly may, there is that in the story of every life which teaches the inefficiency of human means, and the present control of a Supreme agency. See how often relief has come at the moment of extremity, in forms strangely unsought, almost at the time unwelcome; see still more how the back has been strengthened to its increased burdens, and the heart cheered by some unconscious influence of an unseen Power."

We commend this testimony of the Christian hero to every young man whom it may reach, both to rescue the tempted and to stimulate those who are trying to follow the bright example. Moral courage and simple faith in God makes the highest type of manhood.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE ONE HUNDREDTH BIRTHDAY.—Father Henry Boehm, the old Methodist patriarch, says the New York Christian Advocate, entered upon his one hundredth year on the eighth of June, and the wonderful event was celebrated on Tuesday in Jersey City, at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Emley. A number of friends honored him with their presence. It was to the old patriarch quite a surprise. A good supper was provided, with abundance of the delicacies of the season. There was a centenary cake, having on it the figures 1775 and 1874. Flowers of rare beauty and odor were presented him, and he made a most appropriate reply. On one of them, beautifully inwrought in green, were these figures, "99." The patriarch's wrinkled countenance was wreathed with smiles; he looked as placid as a summer's evening, and he seemed to "renew his youth like the eagles."

Dr. J. B. Wakeley was spokesman for the occasion, and delivered a congratulatory address, which we publish because the occasion was rare, and it contains so much history that will be of general interest. He concluded by dwelling upon the character and labors of Bishop Asbury, and surprised Father Boehm by presenting him with a beautiful likeness of the Bishop. Father Boehm took it, looked at it, and said: "Well done!" and then he made a characteristic reply. It was one of those rare occasions that seldom occur in one's lifetime, and can never be forgotten.

REV. W. E. DOTY, of the Louisiana Conference, is spending the summer in Tennessee. He is at present at the Red Boiling Springs, Macon county. From that point he writes us, July 2, that he is slowly improving in health, although still feeble and suffering much. We sincerely trust that our beloved brother may be soon and fully restored to health. He says: "I hope to live awhile yet, but should it be otherwise my trust is in Almighty goodness, and I go with the confidence of a child into the arms of its mother."

THE new Discipline has reached us. It has an appendix containing the pastoral address of the Bishops and the boundaries of the Annual Conferences. Of course everybody will want a copy at once. There is a good supply at the Depository, 110 and 112 Camp street.

The Jesuits—Their Work and Fate.

The experience of three centuries shows that the Jesuits have no lucky hand. No blessing ever rests on their undertakings. They build with unwearied assiduity, but a storm comes and shutters the building, or a flood comes and washes it away, or the worm-eaten edifice falls to pieces in their hands. The Oriental proverb about the Turk applies to them: "Where the Turk sits grass never grows." Their missions in Paraguay, Japan and among the tribes of North America have long since gone to ruin. In Abyssinia they had once (in 1625) almost attained dominion, but some time afterward (in 1634) the whole concern collapsed, and they never ventured to return there. What is left to-day of their laborious missions in the Levant, the Greek Islands, Persia, the Crimea and Egypt? Scarcely a reminiscence of their former presence there is to be found on the spot.

Above all, the Society of Jesus devoted its best services to its native home in Spain. The result was bankruptcy and depopulation of that once powerful kingdom, and its loss of one possession after another, so that by the end of the seventeenth century it had become an inanimate corpse, the skeleton of a giant. It is behind every other country in Europe, except Turkey, and, having no healthy literature of its own, has to feed on the foreign literature of France. Well might a Spanish diplomatist in Rome say, at the suppression of the order: "The Jesuits are the wood-worm that gnaws at our bowels."

They it was that brought on the German nations the thirty years' war, and its results, and to them Catholic Germany owes the decline of its schools, and its consequent backwardness in cultivation and long intellectual sterility. It was they who completely undermined the ancient German and Catholic empire, and paved the way for its fall. They, as the all-powerful conscience-keepers of the Hapsburgs, Ferdinand the First, Ferdinand the Second and Leopold the First, have on their conscience the destruction of the liberties of the States of the empire, the enforcement of absolutism, the oppression and expulsion of the Protestants.

Bohemia has long been given over to the care and charge of the Jesuits; and what have they made of it? They have utterly destroyed the old Czech literature, and have brought matters to such a pass that nearly the whole Bohemian nobility is annihilated through confiscation, executions and banishment.

In England the destiny of the Catholics was for a century molded by the influence of the Jesuits at Rome, and the intense hatred which they excited at home; and we have seen what a monstrous weight of misfortune and oppression they rolled down on the shoulders of their co-religionists.

They tried to reintroduce Catholicism into Sweden by means of a liturgy, forcibly imposed on the clergy, and with the help of the king, Sigismund, who was under their guidance. Sigismund, in consequence, lost his crown, and they were banished forever from the country. In Russia they undermined, by means of their instrument, the false Demetrius, to establish Polish influence, and to bring the empire and nation into subjection to the see of Rome; but their proselyte and protege was killed, and they had to quit the country. In Poland they dominated the kings, the higher clergy and the nobility for a long time; and Poland is destroyed. In France the Jesuits were the conscience-keepers of the Bourbons, and their spiritual children, Louis the Fourteenth and Louis the Fifteenth, paved the way for the revolution and the destruction of the dynasty; or rather, one may say, made it inevitable.

I readily leave to this order the fate of the Vatican decrees—namely, 1870, the Infallibility of the Pope—the more readily as it has the duties of paternity to discharge toward them; for the Jesuits excogitated, sketched out and finally shaped those decrees, though with the assistance of certain bishops.—Doellinger.

THE Society of the Dunkards hold to the scriptural rule to "greet one another with a holy kiss." But during the past few years there has been quite a large accession of colored members of their organization. This gives rise to a difficulty on the kissing question. It is, of course, claimed that there ought to be no distinction made "on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude;" but it seems that even the Dunkards have not all been educated up to the standard of perfect equality in regard to kissing. The subject was discussed at a recent Conference held in Illinois, at which five hundred preachers were present. The Conference, after worrying over the subject several days, finally adopted the local option rule, allowing each particular church to do as it pleases about the kissing of colored members.

The colored men and brethren have already done a good deal, instrumentally, for the emancipation of their white brethren from many foolish and hurtful prejudices and practices. Perhaps their presence may help to deliver their Dunkard friends from the very objectionable practice referred to.—New York Christian Advocate.

THE University of Missouri, at its late commencement, says the St. Louis Christian Advocate, conferred on our excellent friend, Brakston Craven, D. D., the honorary degree of LL. D., and thereby manifested an appreciation of true merit and real worth. Dr. Craven is and has long been president of Trinity College, North Carolina.

WE CALL ATTENTION to the advertisement of the trustees of Mansfield Female College. A president is wanted, and a good position is offered to some man who wishes to devote himself to education.

PROMISE cautiously; but when you have promised, fulfill scrupulously.

The Beecher-Tilton Scandal.

Our exchanges contain a great deal n reference to this matter. The ittsburg Christian Advocate sums p the case as follows:

The Beecher-Tilton scandal has een revived again in the papers by he publication of a long article from he pen of Mr. Tilton, in his paper, he Golden Age. In common with any other papers, we have given no urrency to this story heretofore. It now, however, finding its way into l the daily and weekly sheets, and ur readers should at least have a eneral idea of it. We miss no judgent now, but wait for developents. The gist of Mr. Tilton's story ay be set forth in a few words. e says: "After I had been for fifteen ears a member of Plymouth church, nd had become the intimate friend f the pastor, knowledge came to me, 1870, that he had committed gainst me an offense which I forbear name or characterize. Prompted y my self-respect, I immediately eased my attendance on his ministry," etc.

Mr. Tilton, it will be remembered, as subsequently permitted to withraw without trial and his name ropped from the rolls of the church, consequence of which there was eat commotion in the Congregaonal folds, and the famous Brooklyn Council was the result, of which r readers have been informed. nce then some of Mr. Beecher's iends and others have borne pretty rd upon Mr. Tilton, and he has en charged with maliciously circulating slanderous stories on Mr. echer. The ostensible object of the ove-named article from his pen is defend himself against these negations. In the course of his strictes he gave the following as part of letter from Mr. Beecher:

"BROOKLYN, January 1, 1871.

"I ask Theodore Tilton's forgiveess, and humble myself before him I do before my God. He would ve been a better man in my cumstances than I have been. I n ask nothing except that he will member all the other breasts that old ache. I will not plead for self. I even wish that I were ad. * * * * * *

H. W. BEECHER."

Strange to say, since the publicaon of this article, in the middle of t week, things have gone on apently as usual in Mr. Beecher's urch. He was present at the Fri- evening prayer meeting, and ached last Sunday his farewell mon, preparatory to his summer cation, and on neither occasion de the least allusion to the matter ich must have been in every one's nd. His congregation stand by n, and believe him to be not only of the greatest but one of the t men in the world. Many crowdaround him after the service to him good-by and to express their mpathy and confidence.

r. Beecher declines to make any y at present. His friends say t his letter to Mr. Tilton, if genre, refers to a matter different from at might be inferred; and some y the genuineness of the letter. he matter stands at the date of writing.

he principal New York papers, r as we have seen, seem to symize with Mr. Beecher. The Her- is pretty severe on Tilton, intiing that he is the victim of monable jealousy. The Tribune the following:

The charge against Mr. Beecher ust this: Four years ago Mr. Tilclaims to have received information which led him to charge Mr. echer with having made a dissorable suggestion to his wife, s is the extent of the charge, and only charge Mr. Tilton has ever e against Mr. Beecher. That is and it is well known to the bers of Mr. Beecher's church Mrs. Tilton has repeatedly and hatically denied it. This exation of the entire case is corand General Tracy felt glad for that Mr. Tilton had made his lention. The public now know worst that can be said on the ect, and it will now understand the members of Plymouth rch, who have all along been and accurately informed in the er, have so unanimously stood heir pastor during this long and rtunate controversy."

HE LONDON CREMATION AND SOCIETY.—From one of our far-exchanges we learn that there organized in London, on the eenth ultimo, with a capital of 000 in £1 shares, what is known as Cremation and Urn Society. The cts in contemplation are set forth llows:

provide suitable means for the d decomposition of dead human es by cremation or burning, in of producing the same results he slow process of burial, and for pose to purchase land in conent localities, or to make arrangets for carrying out the objects in ing cemeteries or burial-places, jacent thereto, and to erect and tain all suitable buildings and ances, by means of which the ts may be carried out with proy and decorum, and with such ous observances as may be usual proper. Also to erect and mainsuitable buildings for the recepand preservation of the remains rns or other receptacles, either ch land to be so purchased, or in ing cemeteries or burial-places.

POTTER'S COMPLETE BIBLE ENCYCLOPEDIA. Edited by Rev. William Blackwood, D. D., LL. D. With valuable contributions by other eminent divines. With nearly three thousand fine illustrative engravings by the best artists. Philadelphia: John E. Potter & Co.

We have received from the publishers the first twelve parts of this splendid work, and embracing 304 pages. It is in quarto form, three columns to the page, new brevier type, leaded, on a heavy toned paper of superior quality, and highly calendered surface. So far as we have been able to examine the contents, the articles have been prepared with great care, and are free from bias, fairly and candidly written. They exhibit ripe scholarship, and contain the latest results of criticism, of historical information, and discoveries in the arts and sciences. The range of subjects is wide, and the information is full and accurate. The engravings are finely executed, very numerous, and are among the most valuable and attractive features of the work. The following statements concerning its character and scope are fully verified by the portions of the work which have reached us:

"This encyclopedia, besides including everything usually found in a complete Bible dictionary, also embraces all the available information in the entire range of biblical, ecclesiastical, historical and general religious literature, from the earliest times to the present day. This vast fund of knowledge has been gathered from thousands of publications, the writings of eminent divines and distinguished scholars of all lands and ages of the world.

"The work is peculiarly practical, and adapted to popular use in its arrangement and in its mode of treating every subject. The articles appear in alphabetical order, with the subject of each distinctly indicated. In the preparation of each article care is exercised to give the known facts in plain and terse language, excluding mere theories, opinions and conjectures. The English tongue alone is employed, and in the few instances in which it is necessary to insert foreign words English characters are used. Such references to passages of Scripture are given as are requisite to make the articles clear and complete.

"The articles are faithful in statement, and free from bias in matters of historical, biographical and doctrinal detail. In stating the views and tenets of Christian denominations, and of individual writers and teachers, the most rigid attention is bestowed in the choice of phraseology, to give them impartially and without color of favor or prejudice.

"The editor, Rev. Dr. Blackwood, is a scholar and divine of great learning and varied attainments, pre-eminently fitted, by his literary tastes, as well as by his classical education and intimate acquaintance with religious literature, to make the work complete and reliable. A long and successful experience in the pulpit enables him to clothe each statement in the most intelligible and lucid language. He is ably assisted by a strong corps of divines, eminent in their respective branches of the church as leading thinkers and writers.

"Not the least important and valuable feature of the work are the excellence, appropriateness and liberal number of its pictorial illustrations. More than three thousand first-class engravings are in course of preparation, illustrative of manners and customs; rites and ceremonies, architecture, furniture and decoration of churches and temples, antiquities, monumental and other remains, useful and fine arts, cities and towns, mountains, hills and valleys, rivers, lakes and seas, landscapes, etc. Many of the geographical and topographical illustrations are from photographs, while those of sculpture, paintings and similar subjects are mainly from the originals."

SHALL WOMEN be enjoined from taking part in the prayer meetings of the church? was a question sent up to the General Assembly, at St. Louis by a restive presbytery in Illinois. The answer of the standing committee, to whom the overture was referred, was: "Yes, except in emergencies to be decided by the pastor and elders." In the light of the fact that there is an ever-present "emergency" requiring the use of all means to make the prayer meeting as good as possible, this might perhaps be considered a favorable reply, considering past deliverances on this point. But this diplomatic position on the fence was so strongly objected to by some who insisted that, if the practice was unscriptural, they should plainly say so, and if it wasn't they should say so, and by some who believed that woman's help was needed in the prayer meeting as much as anywhere else, and demanded that the old prohibitions be repealed, that the whole subject has been referred to a special committee for further consideration, and is to come back to the Assembly for further debate. We should like to be there and witness the contortions of the brethren who want to keep to the old paths, but are bothered by the remembrance of the countenance they have been giving to the temperance crusade. A woman may not pray in the family conference of the church, but she may pray before a saloon door, surrounded by a crowd that fills the streets! No, good friends, that wall is too wide for the longest-limbed logic to stand with a foot on each side at the same time. If women may pray in saloons, if women may teach in Bible classes, if women may talk in church sociables, there is neither Scripture nor common sense to forbid their talking or praying—any more than their singing—in the church prayer meeting. Some time it will seem very strange that the church was satisfied for so long to seal the lips of the best half of its membership in its social meetings. It seems very strange now to those churches which have learned the better way.—Advance.

Seashore Camp Ground.

The annual camp meeting on the Seashore camp ground, two miles west of Biloxi, Mississippi, will commence on Friday, the twenty-fourth of July, and continue beyond the second Sabbath.

Great improvements have been made on the grounds since the encampment of last year. The number of private tents has been more than doubled, and several additional public tents have been erected.

A number of plain but comfortable wooden tents, with good floor and roof, are being put up for rent to individuals or families desiring to hire, some 12 feet by 13, at $10, others 12 feet by 25, at $15, for the period of the camp meeting.

Persons desiring to erect cloth or other temporary tents will have comfortable positions assigned them on application to any member of the board of trustees.

Gentlemen of experience in the business have been placed in charge of the boarding department, who will furnish good and satisfactory board on the terms of last year, to wit: Fifty cents for breakfast and supper each, and seventy-five cents for dinner, or $1.50 per day.

Lodging accommodations are provided for at fifty cents per night.

The trustees have made arrangements with the railroads for conveyance of passengers at reduced prices. By the New Orleans and Mobile railroad, from New Orleans for $3.25 and from Mobile for $2.50 for the trip, and proportionate prices from all the way stations; and by the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern railroad at half the usual price of regular fare.

These roads will issue a special camp meeting ticket, with return coupon, which will require to be stamped at the office of the secretary on the camp ground in order to be good to return on.

In this city tickets can be had at the ticket office, corner of Camp and Common streets, and at the depot, at the head of Canal street; and at the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, and at all the way stations on the roads.

Passenger trains will leave the depot, at head of Canal street, New Orleans, daily, at 8 A. M., 3.15 P. M. and 4 P. M.; and depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 8 A. M. and 5 P. M., all stopping at all way stations, including camp meeting station, except the 4 P. M. train from New Orleans, which will stop at the principal stations only, except on Saturdays, when it also will stop at camp meeting station.

Freight trains leave the depot, corner of Levee and Girod streets, New Orleans, at 8 25 A. M.; and the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 9.30 A. M. daily, and take freight to or from the camp meeting at half the usual prices.

Persons desiring to attend the camp meeting are recommended to make arrangements for their comfort before the date of the camp meeting by application to any member of the board of trustees.

A WONDERFUL ART.—The manufactory in Rome where pictures are copied in mosaic, being thus rendered almost everlasting or time proof, is the most celebrated establishment of the kind in the world, some of its productions being little less than miracles of artistic genius, beauty and skill. The mosaic is formed of tiny bits of opaque colored glass of various shades, amounting, it is said, to the almost incredible number of thirty thousand different and distinct shades, themselves so arranged as to form a picture perfect in every detail—in light, shadow, shade and color. It is described as corresponding in some measure to the pictures formed in Berlin wool. The various pieces of colored glass are placed in their prearranged order on a table covered with a sort of cement, and when this tedious process is over—for there are many thousands of pieces in each picture—the surface of the picture is then smoothed and polished. These are the main features, mechanically considered, of this wonderful art.

ORIGIN OF POPES.—Gregory the Seventh, the great Hildebrand, was the son of a carpenter. The English Nicholas Breakspeare, who was Adrian the Fourth, was born in a poor farm-house. Urban the Fourth was the son of a French cobbler. The father of Benedict the Eleventh was a keeper of sheep. John the Twenty-second was the son of a shoemaker, and his successor was the son of a miller. Alexander the Fifth knew nothing of his parents, except that they were beggars, and begged himself, when a youth, from door to door. The renowned Sixtus the Fourth was the son of a poor fisherman. The warlike Julius II., who laid the corner-stone of St. Peter's, and employed Raphael and Michael Angelo, used to say he remembered the time when, in the market at Genoa, he peddled onions which he had brought in his boat from Savonna. And Sixtus the Fifth, one of the most distinguished in the long series, had been a pig-driver when a boy.

EACH one is the painter and the sculptor of his life. We are Christians only inasmuch as we are the images of our divine Model.—St. Gregory of Nyssa.

E. E. F. ROSS, ESQ., connected for several years with the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, left on the evening of June 6 to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

OVER THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD BY DAYLIGHT.—Probably the best specimen of an American highway to be found anywhere is the Pennsylvania railroad between Pittsburg and New York. Insolidity of construction, superiority of bridge architecture and smoothness of track it is unrivaled. Throughout its entire length it is laid with a double track of steel rails, weighing sixty-seven pounds to the yard. The rolling stock is as near perfection as human ingenuity can make it, combining the highest excellence attainable. On the first of June commenced running the fast train from Pittsburg to New York, with close connections at Harrisburg for Baltimore and Washington. The magnificent run of four hundred and forty-four miles between Pittsburg and New York is made with but three stoppages. The train is made up of Pullman parlor cars and the company's best day coaches, all splendidly upholstered, mounted on combination springs, and furnished with plate glass, through which the landscape can be distinctly seen. The scenery on this line is beautiful, and in many places grand. The attractions of the Alleghany mountains need no comment. The long sweeps of wooded hills, lofty mountains and dark ravines, picturesque valleys opening into each other, sparkling and placid waters, and wide-rolling pastoral landscapes fall in rapid succession. After having breakfasted in the Mississippi valley and dined at the capital of Pennsylvania, the passenger finds himself seated at the supper-table in the metropolis of New York.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE, STAUNTON, VIRGINIA.—We take pleasure in directing attention to the advertisement of this popular seminary for the education of young ladies. Located at the city of Staunton, in the center of the far-famed Shenandoah valley, and commanding every facility that can contribute to the mental and physical health of its pupils, it presents attractions unsurpassed if not unequaled in the South. The buildings are spacious, and situated on an eminence from which can be taken in at a glance the grand and picturesque scenery of mountain and vale on either side, and the beautiful valley stretching out north and south. The grounds are laid off into walks, and ornamented with shrubbery, flowers and trees, constituting a delightful and healthful promenade and pleasure resort for the pupils. The board of teachers and officers is composed of over twenty, each peculiarly fitted from education and experience for the position he or she holds. Over one hundred young ladies from fifteen Southern States enjoyed the advantages of this Institute during the past year. We cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers.

FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, NEW YORK.—Among the varied attractions offered to visitors to the great city of New York there is nothing which strikes the stranger with more pleasant surprise, and we may say amazement, than the wonder of her hotels. Such are not to be found in any other part of the world. Not only the splendor and vastness of the buildings and costliness of the furniture and appurtenants, which surpass in their luxuriousness the palaces of the kings, but the almost endless variety of viands, of every domestic production and imported from all parts of the globe, make up bills of fare equal to the demands of the most capricious appetites, and at the same time afford food for reflection upon the skill, enterprise and indomitable energy of those men and companies who erect and conduct them. Messrs. Darling, Griswold & Co., proprietors of the Fifth Avenue, located at 198 Fifth avenue, are in the front rank of such enterprise. Their house is supplied with all the modern improvements and conveniences, and it seems to us that nothing is wanting that a guest could desire.

THE attention of our readers is directed to the advertisement of Messrs. Levy Bros., 589 Magazine street, who have for sale a complete line of summer dry goods.

WE HAVE had for several months the constant use of Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, and it has given such satisfaction to the guests of our house that our orders for it have been larger than for all other kinds of sauce combined.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE.

STAUNTON, VIRGINIA,

will begin its Twenty-third Annual Session SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

REV. W. A. HARRIS, D. D., President, with an able corps of twenty-three teachers and officers. Modern languages taught and spoken by European teachers. Music by seven professors and teachers, among whom are two of the most cultivated teachers of vocal music in the South.

This is one of the healthiest climates in the world. Its marked effect is the rapid promotion of the physical health and vigor of our pupils. Those who come here from the South, with feeble constitutions, chills and climatic diseases, are entirely restored.

Buildings elegant, fanned by the purest breezes, and commanding the most magnificent rural and mountain scenery, making it one of the most delightful college homes in the Union.

The last session one hundred and eleven young ladies attended this school, as boarding pupils, from fifteen Southern States.

Extracts from Testimonials.

From Bishop D. S. Doggett, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, located in Staunton, Virginia, under the presidency of Rev. W. A. Harris, is, in my judgment, one of the best institutions for young ladies in the South. I have occasion to know and appreciate its value by the advantages enjoyed by one of my daughters, now a pupil there. It possesses all the facilities of a thorough female education. Its personal accommodations are all that can be desired for health and comfort or taste. No location could be more eligible, no scenery more magnificent, no atmosphere more salubrious. It is now in a state of great prosperity, and I feel no hesitation in recommending it to the patronage of all who wish their daughters to receive the brilliants of a useful and ornamental culture.

D. S. DOGGETT.

From Bishop E. M. Marvin, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute is an honor to the church. Instruction is thorough. All classes stand high. Its music advantages are all-fired of a very high order. The most talented professors are employed, and neither pains nor expense are spared to make this department eminent. The school is very prosperous, and deserves to be so.

E. M. MARVIN.

From Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, deserves the brilliant success it enjoys. It has a good corps of teachers, a beautiful situation and excellent management. Having had a daughter under Mr. Harris' care during the present session, my observation leads me to believe this school to be one of the best of female seminaries which adorn our State. FRANCIS H. SMITH.

THE GREATEST

MEDICAL DISCOVERY

OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,

FROM

The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both blood-tumors.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your last day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Raw and Inflamed,

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly,

ap11 1y DONALD KENNEDY.

LITTLE SUE ON THE WOMAN QUESTION.

BY J. S. LEA.

Me and Dolly,
Jack and Pully,
Been to take a walk.
Me and Polly
Felt real jolly;
Dolly couldn't talk.

Jack was baddest,
He was maddest
Boy I ever seed,
'Cause Nurse Mary
Wouldn't carry
His velocopede.

We runned races
In nice places
Going through the park.
Jack was naughty;
Mamma, oughi he Made Poll's doggie bark?

A wee, wee girlie,
Hair all curly—
Such a pretty dress—
'Lone was walkin';
Nurse was talkin'
To her beau, I guess.

Puff jumped at her;
How it scart her!
Down she fell, 'mos' dead.
'Cause Jack said: S-s take her!
Thought 'twould break her
Pitty little head.

'Twan't Puff, mamma,
'Cause Poll's grandma
Said he'd never bite.
He's so coaxing,
He's jes' running.
He sought it was right.

What's the reason
Boys is teazin'
All the time to girls?
Like Uncle Harry,
I shall marry
Some nice girl with curls.

A Strange but True Story from Switzerland.

The cheerful little hamlet or town of Glaris is beautifully situated in the picturesque valley of the Linth, at the foot of the Glarnish, one of the most glorious mountains in the eastern part of Switzerland.

The scenery around is perhaps neither so grand nor so magnificent as it is in many other places, but the peaceful loveliness of this valley has not been surpassed by anything I have seen yet.

Tourists do not often go in that direction. Glaris is rather like a violet concealed in the grass, which, when once discovered, is doubly charming from the modesty with which it has hiddeu its sweetness.

My story has, however, nothing to do with the scenery, nor even with the town of the present day, which I might call altogether a new creation. I would rather refer my readers to Glaris as it was ten years ago.

It was then, as I have already mentioned, a cheerful little hamlet, elevated to the rank of a town from its being the chief place of the canton of the same name.

Its inhabitants were simple and true-hearted, industrious and opulent, and, I think I may add, the most hospitable people in Switzerland.

One night, however—a fearful night—was to end all the peaceful happiness of its inhabitants.

People went to rest as usual, some commending their souls to God, others trusting themselves carelessly to the chance of waking up to another morning light.

Midnight had struck some time ago, when the town was suddenly alarmed by the cry of "Fire!" In a moment everybody able to lend a helping hand was on the spot; friend and foe, forgetting everything else, labored and struggled with the wild element to stop its further progress.

The burning house was a small building in the center of the town. How the fire began was never rightly ascertained; it was believed at the time that the imprudence of a servant was the principal cause of it.

However, as the house was small, and help so quickly at hand, everybody hoped the fire would soon be put out; but a greater danger was approaching where no one was expecting it.

In the midst of the confusion a roaring sound was heard in the distance, coming nearer and nearer, and the horror-stricken people heard but too distinctly that the greatest of foes, the Fohn, which no human power can arrest, was rapidly approaching.

The Fohn is a very warm south wind, which blows at certain times of the year across the Alps. Wherever it can find access, it has the strange peculiarity that it not only kindles fire, but draws it, I might say, with a magnetic power. When, therefore, this wind is known to approach, all the fires are everywhere put out at once, so as to prevent accidents, which would be sure to happen if this precaution were not strictly observed.

But now who will put out in a moment's time the fire of a burning house? It is impossible. In spite of all efforts, the giant approaches with rapid strides. It blows with its usual violence over the fiery pile, and throws furiously right and left the burning splinters over the unfortunate town. Each spark kindles a fire, and in less than an hour the whole town is bathed in a sea of flames.

From every surrounding village, and from distant towns even, help is sent without delay. But all in vain; the elements will have their prey, and will not let it go until it is torn to pieces and utterly destroyed.

It was a fearful sight, and yet how glorious! That beautiful valley around, only a few hours ago wrapped in the cloak of darkness, now lit up with almost celestial splendor; and those stately mountains, with snow-white summits, glowing like a high altar on which earth offers up its sacrifice of thanksgiving to the God of heaven, and looking down in proud compassion on the misery below.

Thus the night went on, the morning dawned, and the sun arose in all his glory, as if he neither knew nor cared for the scene of destruction which his brightness displayed to the sight of man.

There was fair Glaris, now a heap of wrecks and ruin. One single night had laid in ashes no less than five hundred dwellings, and its helpless inhabitants could only look on it in silent grief or wring their hands in silent despair. Little or nothing could be saved; the great calamity had come so suddenly that there was no time for anything else but hasty flight.

And yet—is it possible? One solitary cottage rises from among those smoking ruins. All else around is burnt to the ground, but this one house stands firmly there, as if it had been protected by a more than human hand.

It was, indeed, God's own almighty hand which had saved and guarded it. And why should that house be so peculiarly favored? It is a wonderful story which answers this question, and it runs thus:

"There lived a rich man at Glaris who had a very faithful servant, and to reward him for his good services his master built him yonder house, where he might dwell with his wife and child. He also helped him to a little independent business.

"Years went on, and the servant was taken ill; his business was neglected, for his wife had enough to do with taking care of him and her household, and when the poor man recovered from his illness he found himself so deeply plunged in debt that he found no prospect before him but to stop payment, and perhaps even to be sent to prison.

"In his great distress he remembered his kind benefactor, and, however reluctant he was to take advantage of his generosity, yet for the sake of his wife and child he resolved to go to him and tell him all his troubles.

"The rich man received him kindly, and gave him at once a sum of money which was more than enough to satisfy his creditors, and to that he added another sum of equal value to set up his business again.

"Deeply moved by this great generosity, the servant thanked him with tears in his eyes, and vowed in his heart from that moment that if ever his benefactor were in need of him, and should it be at the cost of all he possessed and at the peril of his own life, he would stand by him and never forsake him.

"And now in this fearful night his faithfulness was to be put to the test. The fire was raging everywhere around; the rich man's house did not escape; on two sides it had already begun to burn, and he was lying sick, old and infirm, on his bed; no one was near him, for no one had time to think of anything else but saving his own life.

"In this helpless state he quietly and patiently awaited the fate which seemed inevitable. Already the flames were beginning to enter his room, and still no one came to his rescue, when suddenly the door opened, and in another moment the faithful servant was by his side. He lifted the old man carefully out of his bed, and carried him, as tenderly as a mother would have carried her child, away from the burning house and out of the town, until he arrived at a village, where he set him down in a cottage belonging to a friend of his, whose wife promised to take care of him until his deliverer should come back again.

"The servant then returned to the town in search of his wife and child, whom he had given in charge of a neighbor, so that he might himself save the life of his benefactor.

"It was, however, only on the next morning that he discovered them among the many families who were scattered homeless about the fields, waiting until succor should come and draw them out of their state of misery and destitution.

"It was on the next morning also that he discovered his own cottage standing unharmed amidst the dreary waste.

"What his feelings were no pen can describe, no words could utter. In silent awe he fell on his knees, thanking God from his inmost heart, and earnestly purposing that, as he had until now served his earthly master, so he would henceforth till the end of his life serve the Lord of lords, the God who had so wonderfully protected him and his in the time of great danger.

"As soon as he was settled down again he brought his master to his home, and, together with his wife, he took care of him as long as he lived."

Glaris has since been rebuilt, and looks as cheerful as ever; but the story of the faithful servant and his kind and generous master will never be forgotten in the hearts of its inhabitants, still less the wonderful way in which God protected the poor man's cottage amidst fire and flames, and rewarded him for his self-sacrificing gratitude.—Aunt Judy's Magazine.

A CHILD'S QUESTION.—When Father Sawyer, of Maine, had reached his hundredth birthday the event was celebrated by a public service, which was attended by throngs of all ages. After his address and prayer many children were taken up to shake hands with the patriarch and receive his blessing. One very little girl, who was much impressed by the occasion, at length whispered to her mother: "I guess he always minded his mamma."

"Yes, dear; what made you think of that?"

"Why, mamma, doesn't God say: 'Thy days shall be long?'"

She probably comprehended nothing but the great age of the speaker, but that had been a sermon to her. And is not the mere fact of a Christian's long life a testimony to God's faithfulness, so that, however infirm and helpless, they are honored with being "his witnesses?"

THE LORD BLESS MY PENNIES.—A little girl six years old was desirous of putting her pennies into the missionary box with others. When saying her evening prayers at her papa's knee she hesitated a moment, and then added: "Lord, bless my two pennies for Jesus' sake. Amen." After the child had gone to bed her father asked his wife: "What made Gracie say that?" "She has prayed thus every night since giving her pennies to the missionary box," was the mother's reply. Do you, dear young reader, pray, "God, bless my pennies," when you give your mite to some ragged school? If not, pray earnestly for the blessing, and you will soon find that prayer will do more than your pennies.

Farm, Garden and Household.

Fruit Culture.

It is very strange that people will continue to grow trees year after year without any fruit, and yet praise their system as the best possible one against anything else that can be done. We have contended for years that fruit culture will never be successful until some very different system than that usually practiced shall be adopted. The ground must be so dry to grow good fruit that water will not lie twenty-four hours in summer (in winter it is of no consequence,) without passing away; the fibrous roots must be kept as near the surface as possible, and kept shaded from the intense heat of summer. Then they must be kept highly fed by occasional dressings of surface manure. These are the principles without which, depend on it, American fruit culture will, with occasional exceptions, always be a failure.

If possible, choose a dry piece of ground. If not naturally dry, it is best to throw the earth up into banks or ridges and plant on them. This is cheaper and better than underdraining. In planting, if the roots appear deep, cut away some of the deeper ones, and shorten some of the top of the tree at the same time. This is particularly true of dwarf pears, which are often grafted on rather long quince stocks. Cut away all of the quince root but about six inches, and, if this should be found to leave few roots, cut away the top correspondingly. Most of the failures with dwarf pears come from bad quince roots. So deep in the ground, the lower parts decay, and this decay gradually communicates upward until the whole system becomes diseased. The more tenacious the sub-soil, the more necessary is it to attend to this matter. We spoke of pruning in proportion to injury. It will be found that all trees are a little injured by removal, therefore all trees should be a little pruned at transplanting.

Trees that have long stems exposed to hot suns, or drying wind, become what gardeners call "hide-bound"—that is, the old bark becomes indurated—cannot expand, and the tree suffers much in consequence. Such an evil is usually indicated by gray lichens which feed on the decaying bark. In these cases a washing of weak lye or of lime-water is very useful; indeed, where the bark is healthy, it is beneficial thus to wash the trees, as many eggs of insects are thereby destroyed.

Whitewash is frequently resorted to by farmers; but the great objection is its unsightly appearance; the result is otherwise good. The great opposition to washes formerly was that the pores of the bark were closed by them. This was on the supposition that the bark was alive, but the external bark of most trees has been dead years before the time of application; and "the breathing," if so the operations of the pores can be called, is through the crevices formed in the old bark by the expansion of the growing tree, by which the living tree below has a chance of contact with the air. No matter what kind of coating is applied to the bark of a tree, it will soon crack sufficiently, by the expansion of the trunk, to permit all the "breathing" necessary.—Gardeners' Monthly.

Sheep-Shearing in Australia.

From the Agricultural Gazette (England) we give the following description of the manner in which sheep are shorn in Australia:

"The shearers are paid by the hundred sheep shorn. They got about 16s., with board and lodging, when I was in the country. At this rate a good man can often make more than £1 a day, and it is no uncommon thing in the colonies to shear nearly two hundred sheep between five in the morning and six in the afternoon. At five A. M. the shearing day generally commences, the first interruption being breakfast at eight, when also the first count of the shorn sheep takes place. The count is made either by the man in charge of the shed or by the owner of the station. Each shearer's sheep are counted separately out of their pen, and the number is booked. If any are too badly shorn to pass, the delinquent operator is called to account and admonished, being probably threatened with dismissal if he does not improve. With reference to the statement that men could frequently shear nearly two hundred sheep a day, I may as well remark that sheep are shorn in a very rough manner in the colonies, very different to the way they are shorn in England; the unfortunate animal appears, after it has undergone the operation, all over ridges of wool and cuts. I do not suppose it often occurs, but I did see one sheep so badly cut in the throat that, as its death was certain, it had to be killed to make it fit for food. For the satisfaction of those who object to cruelty to animals, I may say that men often get their coups for cutting the sheep when shearing.

"After breakfast the men go on busily till about half-past ten, when some one in authority calls out: 'Smoko.' This word is well understood, and means a spell of a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes for a pipe. Every man is bound to stop when he has finished the sheep he is engaged upon, even though he is no smoker, and I should think that the pause must be a very welcome one, as no work is more fatiguing than shearing. During 'smoko' the second count of shorn sheep is made, and when the time is up the men all start at a given signal. Twelve o'clock is the dinner hour. In the afternoon there are two pauses for 'smoko' at appointed times, the day's work ending at six. Outside the shed various operations connected with the shearing are being performed. The shepherd is probably toled off to keep the supply up for the shearers. Two or three men are employed in branding the newly-shorn sheep, and when sheep-washing is going on a large staff of men is required for that purpose."

Coloring Cheese.

One of the means employed to give cheese a rich cream color is to expose the curd, before and after salting, to the air, instead of hurrying it into the hoop or press, as is usual with the majority of dairymen. Every cheese-maker must have observed the fine golden color acquired by the particles of curd that have accidentally remained out of the hoop, and exposed during the day to the atmosphere. This is the precise color desired by the dealer, and in warm weather an exposure long enough for the desired color is practicable, and the appearance of the curd can be materially changed for the better by letting it remain in the vat or tub until it has acquired the proper temperature for the press. It is always preferable to cool curd in this way, instead of using water or cold whey on the curd, as is sometimes done for this purpose, as these last have a tendency to impoverish the cheese by washing out a portion of its richness, besides injuring somewhat its flavor. Fine flavor, quality and the proper texture in cheese are important requisites to ready sales and good prices. But all these may be present, and yet the cheese sell low in market for its bad appearance. The eye must be suited as well as the taste, and it is difficult to make the consumer believe that pale, white cheese is as rich as that which has a fine cream color. Again, many dairymen are troubled, more or less, in preserving a smooth, elastic rind; the rind checks and deep cracks are found here and there in the cheese. This results often, and for the most part, from the air being allowed to blow on the young cheese; cheese, when it comes from the press, and for several days after, or until the rind has a firm consistency, should be kept where the air may not blow directly upon it; and washing the cheese twice a week with hot, sweet whey will add much to its outward appearance. Annatto is in general use during the spring and fall for coloring milk for cheese-making, but as much of it is adulterated with poisonous materials its use should be avoided in summer, when the desired color to the cheese can be obtained as above described.—Canada Farmer.

SHEEP OR DOGS.—The suggestion that every farmer should keep a few sheep is certainly a good one. As it pays to keep a few pigs to gather up such grain or other food as might without them go to waste, so also does it pay to keep a few sheep to browse in fence corners and stubble-fields, and to gather in the feed-lots scattered straws or blades of fodder which cattle never notice. Sheep seem to delight in the variety these odd ends afford them, and a few could be easily kept on nearly every farm at a very small expense.

But it seems useless to advise farmers to keep sheep where dogs are as plenty and as bloodthirsty as they are in this county.

There is, however, a way in which a few sheep may be kept in spite of the dogs, and that is to turn them into a small lot with the cows every night. Provide for them a small shed in one corner of the lot, so boarded up as to admit the sheep and not the cows. As a further insurance against attacks, put a bell on one of the cows. A bell on one of the sheep also serves not only as a protection, but enables us to find the flock readily, when, as sometimes happens, it fails to come up to the pasture at night. Dogs seldom attack sheep when confined in small inclosures; and, when penned with cows, the sheep are as safe as if the farmer himself stood in their midst. We have tried the plan, and find it works well.—P. M. S., in National Live Stock Journal.

HEARTBURN.—Why the sensation occasioned by the presence of an acrid acid in the stomach should be called heartburn it is difficult to say, as the distress is not even in the immediate vicinity of the heart. Common parlance, however, has sanctioned the misnomer, and, like many other erroneous terms in common use, it is a fixture in our language. Bi-carbonate of soda is usually given for heartburn, but it merely neutralizes the acidity for the time being, and does not prevent a speedy return of the complaint. In fact all the alkaline solutions given to relieve the burning serve to weaken the stomach, and thereby aggravate the cause of the ailment, viz., indigestion.

What is needed in such cases is something which, by toning and invigorating the gastric membrane, and thus promoting a free flow of the secretion which dissolves the food, accelerates the work of digestion and assimilation. Avoid nostrums and consult a physician.

THE Food Journal relates that Pompeiian dinners usually comprised three courses, the first consisting of eggs, oysters, salad, pickles, etc.; the second of made dishes, fish, roasts, etc.; the third of pastry, confectionery and fruits. A painting of Pompeii represents a feast in those days, in which an immense dish containing four peacocks stand in the center of the table, surmounted by lobsters, one holding a blue egg in its claws, another a stuffed rat, another an oyster, and the fourth a basketful of grasshoppers. At the bottom of the table are four dishes of fish; and above these partridges, hares and squirrels, each holding its head between its paws. All these are surrounded by a sort of sausage; outside this runs a circle of yolks of eggs; then follows a row of peaches, melons and cherries; and last of all are placed the vegetables in great variety.

BEESWAX.—Melt the comb by boiling it in water. When cool it will form a cake on the surface, which may be taken off and remelted. The impurities will settle to the bottom, and may be scraped off. If the first melting is not sufficient, remelt until clear. This makes the yellow wax of commerce.

Scientific.

M. L. DESINETY states, in a note to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, that he finds that the liver of female animals becomes fatty during lactation.

M. JAMIN calls attention to the fact announced by Treve, that the poles of a magnet remove further from the extremities when an armature is applied.

FROM a series of very curious experiments just made it appears that the high notes of a violin string are accompanied with sufficient concussion to explode iodide of nitrogen on paper affixed to it. The sound-waves generated by the explosion of the merest trifle of ultro-glycerine are also, it is found, capable of exploding an equal quantity of iodide of nitrogen at a distance of eight and a half feet.

IN THE pavilion of the ministry of agriculture at Vienna a floating cannon ball may be seen. Although weighing fifty pounds, it lies like a down-feather on a silvery mass, consisting of pure quicksilver from the celebrated mines of Idria. A hundred and fifty hundredweight of this metal is exhibited in a large iron caldron, offering a sight seldom to be met with, and on it rests the solid iron ball.

INHERITED INSTINCT.—Charles Darwin sends to Nature a communication from Mr. William Huggins, giving a curious instance of inherited mental peculiarity in dogs. The substance of the story is that the sire of the celebrated English mastiff Turk, as well as Turk himself, and at least three of his sons, have all shown from birth the greatest antipathy to butchers and butchers' shops. One of them, named Paris, has been known to detect and spring at a butcher when the latter was disguised as a gentleman of leisure. Another, named Kepler, started back in alarm the first time he ever saw a butcher's shop, and the antipathy has remained unconquerable. Mr. Darwin suggests that this feeling may have originated in the grandfather from some ill treatment, though that supposition is not necessary, since, as he remarks, the animals in the zoological gardens show unaccountable likes and dislikes toward their keepers. He says it is probable that most instinctive feelings were originally acquired by slow degrees through habit, and the experience of their utility, and are now strictly inherited. Many of the most wonderful instincts have been "almost certainly" acquired through the preservation of useful variations of pre-existing instincts. Others may have arisen suddenly in an individual, and then been transmitted to its offspring, independently both of selection and serviceable experience, though subsequently strengthened by habit. "The tumbler pigeon is a case in point; for no one would have thought of teaching a pigeon to turn head over heels in the air; and, until some bird exhibited a tendency in this direction, there could have been no selection." The last sentence, which we quote from Mr. Darwin's letter, does not seem conclusive. How can he be sure that no one would have thought of teaching a bird tricks?

MEANS WHAT HE SAYS.

Though "confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ" and as numerous as the sands on the sea shore were produced to prove that the proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is in earnest, and means what he says, when he offers $500 reward for any case of Catarrh which he cannot cure, yet there would be some skeptics and fogies who would continue to shout: "Humbug! HUMBUG! It cannot be, because Dr. Homespun says Catarrh cannot be cured." Now this Dr. Homespun is the identical good natured old fellow who honestly believes and persists in declaring that this earth is not round or spherical, but as flat as a "slapjack," and does not turn over, otherwise the water would all be spilled out of Deacon Bascom's mill-pond, that astronomical science has positively demonstrated and proven that Dr. Homespun is wrong in supposing the earth to be flat and stationary, and medical science is daily proving the fact that he is no less mistaken and behind the times in regard to the curability of Catarrh. In short, it has been positively proven that this world moves, and that medical science is progressive, the opinion of Dr. Homespun to the contrary notwithstanding. That Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy will cure Catarrh, thousands who have used it attest.

Then buy it and use it; in doubt do not stand;
You will find it in drug stores all over the land.

(From the Catskill Recorder of Nov. 15, 1872.)

A GOOD REMEDY.

We invite attention to the advertisement of Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Our readers will bear us witness that we never knowingly commend humbugs of any name or nature, and a large portion of patent medicines may safely be classed as impositions upon public credulity. But having witnessed the beneficial effects of Sage's Remedy upon the members of our family and others, in Catarrhal cases, we unqualifiedly pronounce it a valuable medicine, entitled to public confidence. The proprietor could easily obtain in Catskill many certificates of its merits.

TO THE SUFFERERS

WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

Having the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this painful disease, with this medicine; and, what satisfies most, the patient recovered by the use of one bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not be cured by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not affected with Rheumatism at all. This being my first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of it. The remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

EDMOND SOUCHON, M. D., Demonstrator of Anatomy.

The Forty-First Annual Course of Instruction

In this Department will commence on Monday, the Sixteenth of NOVEMBER, 1874, and terminate on the third Saturday of March, 1875. Preliminary Lectures on Clinical Medicine and Surgery will be delivered in the amphitheater of the great Charity Hospital, beginning on the Twentieth of October, without any charge to the students. The anatomical rooms will be opened at the same time. The members of the Faculty are visiting physicians and surgeons to the Charity Hospital, and give instruction daily at the bedside of the sick.

FEES.—As the practical advantages afforded in New Orleans for a thorough acquaintance with all the branches of medicine are quite as great as if not superior to those offered by the schools of New York and Philadelphia, the same fees are demanded. For all the Lectures, $100; Matriculation, $5; Practical Anatomy, $10; Graduation, $30. Payment required in advance.

MACHINERY, TIES, ETC.

IMPROVED

EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	923
Lake		2
Arkansas		41
Total		973

Nothing was done on Saturday, all movement being prevented by the heavy rain-storm and the holiday, but on Monday the market opened under the influence of firm prices at Liverpool, with sales of 18,000 bales, and under an advance of 1-16@⅛c. in futures at New York but with the encouraging tenor of these accounts, neutralized by a decline of 2-16 per cent. in sterling exchange, and stiffer steam freights for Liverpool, with no room by sail. The demand was consequently confined to a few buyers for the North, and up to noon we had heard of only 200 bales having changed hands, after which the movement assumed more vitality, with further sales of 600 bales, making an aggregate of 800 bales. Ordinary to strict ordinary sold at 12½ up to 13c., strict good ordinary to low middling at 15⅜c., and low middling at 16c. On Tuesday all desirable lists ruled more in favor of factors, who were enabled in many cases to realize prices indicating a further improvement of fully ⅛c. The entire business summed up 1,100 bales. Among the sales we noticed strict good ordinary at 15⅜c., average low middling at 16c., and good style do at 16⅛c. Low middling was in special request, and being scarce, unless at figures above the ruling rates commanded full prices.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 1,900 bales, against 3,100 for the corresponding time last week and 4,700 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,208,995 bales, against 1,226,-868 bales in the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 278,722 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 114,759 to France, of 115,122 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 21,417 to Great Britain. We quote:

Inferior	8½ @ 9⅛

Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

WARM SPRINGS,

MADISON COUNTY, WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

These Springs are situated in the midst of the highest ranges of mountains east of the Mississippi river, in a country truthfully called the Switzerland of America.

THE BATHS consist of powerful Mineral Water at a temperature of from 98 to 102 degrees Fahrenheit. As these baths are taken at the Springs where the water rises, there is no chance for depreciation of mineral qualities, which renders them superior to those of the Hot Springs of Arkansas and Virginia.

INVALIDS seeking health can find no more favorable place on this continent. There are also pure Cool Sulphur Springs, equal to the Yellow Sulphur Springs of Virginia.

THE HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS are unsurpassed at any watering-place in this country.

BOARD—$10 per month; $12.50 per week; $2 per day. Children under ten years of age and colored servants half price.

VOL. 20. NEW ORLEANS, THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1874. NO. 29.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

NEW YORK, July 6.—The Berlin correspondent of the London Times writes that among the lingering relics of Rheinland there was, until a year ago, a law enabling a bishop to remove the acting clergy at a moment's notice and without assigning any reasons. This license being abolished by the ecclesiastical laws of 1873, the bishops who were to have placed their clergy on equal footing with the rest of the German priests are called upon to do so or pay the penalty fixed. This action of the government is a severe disappointment to the Ultramontanists, who had been hoping that the twelve thousand priests of the western Rheinland would be expelled en masse—a proceeding which could not have aroused the most lukewarm of their parishioners.

The same correspondent says that the resolutions just passed by the general meeting of the German Catholic societies at Mayence began by declaring modern civilization to be at variance with the requirements of their faith, and wound up with reserving to the church the right to decide which laws are in unison with the laws of God and which are not on the basis of this programme. Germany was presented as a country with a servile population and press, weighed down by military despotism at home and abroad, and endangering the peace of the world.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 8.—To the Secretary of War, Washington: A terrible calamity has befallen the people of several counties in the southwestern part of this State. The locusts have destroyed every kind of crops and left the country for miles perfectly bare. They did the same thing last year in the same area. Many thousands are now suffering for food, and I am using every public and private source that I can lawfully command to send immediate supplies of food.

This State is entitled to two years' quota of arms, estimated at $1,860. I respectfully request that the subsistence department be ordered to turn over to me in lieu of these arms a quantity equivalent in value of rations of such provisions as I may request. I should not make this request but for the gravest reasons, and to prevent imminent starvation. I have used every source which the state has given. I earnestly hope that obstacles of form will not be allowed to interfere. Please advise me by telegraph.

O. K. DAVIS, Governor.

Chief Clerk Crosby forwarded the telegram to Secretary Belknap, at New London, with the indorsement: "There appears to be no authority of law for diverting an appropriation from its proper source, even in cases of emergency."

GALVESTON, July 8.—To-day's Mercury publishes accounts of the crops, published by Hilforist & Co., cotton and commission merchants of this city, giving private information received from fifty four different counties. The reports show that the yield of wheat, corn and oats in most sections will be heavy. The cotton is very promising, and, with favorable weather throughout July, the crop will be the largest ever known.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 8.—Dr. R. Jennings, a prominent physician of Nashville, committed suicide, at the hotel at Narragansett Pier, this morning. His niece, daughter of Governor Wise, of Virginia, was with him at the time.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 9.—By the steamship Tartar, from Sydney and Honolulu, it is learned that the King of the Sandwich Islands is advising the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The petitions for such treaty had been presented to the Assembly with the King's indorsement.

The Sydney Herald of June 5, in giving the particulars of the loss of the iron clipper ship British Admiral, on the west side of King's Island, says: "Of eighty-eight persons on board only nine survive to tell of this awful disaster. The captain and the principal officers of the ship were lost. The British Admiral is the fifteenth vessel wrecked on King's Island since 1840, and over eight hundred persons perished on this shore."

GALVESTON, July 10.—A Brownsville special to the News says that the first bale of new cotton was shipped to New Orleans to-day, from the ranche of J. Hynes, at Santa Maria.

LITTLE ROCK, July 11.—The official returns from all the counties but three show a majority of seventy-one hundred and five hundred for the constitutional convention. The convention meets on Tuesday next. A large number of delegates are already here.

ST. LOUIS, July 12.—A gentleman, just from Fort Sill, says that the Indian chiefs Santuna, Big Tree and Lone Wolf are in collusion against the whites, and that serious trouble may be expected. Colonel Carlton, with one company of cavalry, is on scout through Cheyenne agency. Major Upham, with one company, has gone to Medicine Lodge, and three companies of the Fifth Infantry, from Leavenworth, scouting along the trail from Waeblta through Cheyenne agency.

NEW YORK, July 13.—The committee appointed by Beecher to investigate the charges against him are progressing in their examination, and will probably make known the result of their deliberations in a few days. The proceedings of the committee are conducted in a strictly private manner.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., July 13.—The details of the flood caused by the bursting of a factory reservoir at Middlefield show that the water swept over houses, barns and roads, causing great damage. Nearly all the valley residents near Chester suffered more or less by the damage to their farms and gardens. Four bridges were carried off, to replace which it will cost several thousand dollars. No loss of life is reported.

NEW YORK, July 14.—The Brooklyn Argus says this evening: "We have from the highest source an admission that the friends of Beecher are endeavoring to effect a compromise, which shall prevent the publication of the statement promised by Tilton.

"His wife has been before the committee. She has given evidence contradictory of her husband's versions of the matter.

"Disagreement has resulted between man and wife. Mrs. Tilton has left her husband, and is now sojourning with a family, the friends of Mr. Beecher."

FOREIGN.

MADRID, July 8.—General Zaballa is making preparations to renew the attack upon the Carlists at Estella. The defeat of the Carlists in their attack upon Tereule on Saturday last was so complete that they have left that section of country altogether.

General Morriones has been appointed generalissimo of the Republican troops in Navarre.

The Republican army has been reorganized. It is divided into corps; the first, under General Morriones, will operate in Navarre, and the second, under Ceballos, will watch the Ebro district. The strength of the combined army exceeds thirty thousand men, with seventy-nine guns. General headquarters are at Tafialo.

LONDON, July 13.—The Times' special correspondent at Berlin telegraphs that the Bishop of Paderborn has received another sentence of eighteen thousand thalers' fine and three months' detention in the fortress for his persistent violation of the ecclesiastical laws.

There is intense excitement in Berlin over the attempted assassination of Bismarck.

Agnes Strickland, historical authoress, is dead.

The Grasshoppers.

FRIGHTFUL DEVASTATION OF TERRITORY—SIXTY MILES' BREADTH OF COUNTRY LAID WASTE—THE POPULATION DESTITUTE.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 1.—Mr. Atherton, of the American Express Company, just returned from travel along the St. Paul and Pacific, Hastings and Dakota, and Sioux City railroads, says the grasshoppers, commencing south of the last-named road, devastated sixty miles wide, moving northward toward and beyond the St. Paul and Pacific, and will, at the present rate of progress, probably clear off all vegetation on a strip that wide as far north as the Northern Pacific road. A dispatch to-day declares that there are four thousand people in the devastated region without food or means to procure food, and urges that an extra session of the Legislature be called to give $100,000 for their relief.

All accounts from the southwestern part of the State and northwestern Iowa agree that the grasshoppers are rapidly destroying everything green in a large extent of country. The inhabitants of a number of counties are already suffering for food, their crops having been last year destroyed by the same scourge. A large population will soon be almost entirely destitute. Governor Davis is considering the propriety of an extra session of the Legislature to provide for the relief of the suffering and prevent starvation. A single wheat stalk, entirely stripped of its leaves, was received in this city this afternoon, accompanied by the message: "This is the best to be found in eight hundred acres of wheat on Butterfield's farm, near St. James."

Dispatches received this evening from a number of stations on the St. Paul and Sioux City road say the grasshoppers have been flying all day, the air being full of them, moving from exhausted to fresh fields.

A gentleman who has recently returned to St. Paul from a tour in western Minnesota says that the grasshoppers have laid waste a section of country sixty miles wide and extending indefinitely from the southern border in the direction of the Northern Pacific railroad. At the present rate of progress the destroyers will run over the border some time before the close of the season. Dispatches received in St. Paul represent that there are four thousand people in the devastated region without food, and in danger of starvation. Legislative aid is asked. This news merely confirms the predictions that were made last year in these columns as to the probable reappearance of the grasshoppers in Iowa and Minnesota, and the great suffering likely to ensue. A more distressing calamity than a visitation of this description can scarcely be imagined.—Chicago Tribune.

CONTRIBUTION.—No More Help Needed.—Mayor Wiltz has issued the following circular telegram:

New Orleans, July 14.—Supplies from the United States government will render further contributions for relief of the overflowed unnecessary. For donations received the committee of relief returns most cordial thanks. Report of operations will be published about September 1.

By direction of general relief committee. LOUIS A. WILTZ, Mayor and Chairman.

From the Work.

COLUMBIA AND TRIUNE CIRCUIT. Mr. Editor: The Lord is on the floods and ruleth over all, and he has especially manifested himself to us in blessing our labors. Our second Quarterly Conference was made a time of special prayer and faith by the church with fasting. Though our presiding elder did not come, the Lord did not disappoint us. The church was blessed, and some of the members found peace with God through the merits of Jesus. Five persons professed religion and are on their way rejoicing; one accession to the church. Though we were necessarily distressed and disturbed by the overflow, we are not lost; cast down, but not forsaken. We literally learned to "paddle our own canoe." Thanks to Rev. W. V. Taylor for noble service, and also to Rev. H. M. Ragan, local, for efficient labor.

Your brother in Jesus,

PHILIP ALLEN, P. C.

COLUMBIA, LA., July 2, 1874.

NEW IBERIA, LOUISIANA.—Mr. Editor: We are quietly yet earnestly waging war, with spiritual weapons, against sin. We have an increase of membership amounting to thirteen since Conference. We have baptized nine children and united in marriage five couples. We have organized Sabbath schools and classes at four points out of town. We preach at the places once a month. The United Friends of Temperance are doing a good work in this region. I have received a few copies of the last Conference Minutes. I think they are well gotten up. It is due the Opelousas district that the amounts collected at various points for the Mexican mission should be given. They are as follows:

Opelousas	$12 00
Vermilionville	3 70
New Iberia	10 00
New Iberia Sunday school	40 45
Franklin	12 00
Lake Charles	15 00
Cash	5 00
Whole amount	$97 55

These amounts were paid to Bro. Harp in New Orleans. The presiding elder of the Opelousas district collected and paid his widows' and orphans' per cent. It is correctly credited to New Iberia.

Yours fraternally,

B. F. WHITE.

UNION SPRINGS DISTRICT.—Mr. Editor: The spiritual condition of the church is decidedly improving. Only two, that we know of, out of more than a thousand who joined the church last year have been expelled. About two hundred have been added this year. All the preachers are doing well. Our educational enterprises are full of success. The high school at this place closed with about one hundred and thirty pupils. The commencement was a time of unusual interest. The town and surrounding country were thoroughly waked up on the subject of education, and an interest was manifested never before known in this part of the State. The Quarterly Conference at Troy has taken hold of the subject in good earnest. Troy is one of the most prosperous towns in this part of the State. We will open a Methodist high school in that place in September, under the control of Prof. Walker and a corps of competent teachers. We have on the district twenty-four Methodist teachers and about five hundred children in school. Our people need education as well as regeneration. I had rather my children were under the pastoral care of an unregenerated preacher than an unregenerated teacher. I could say much on the subject of the education of our own children, but acting is better than so much writing. Every Quarterly Conference ought to be constituted a board of education to look after the school interests on stations and circuits. The future of our circuits largely depends on the interest the church takes in educating the masses.

The financial condition of the district is improving. All the circuits are doing better financially than last year, with only one exception. The district will do better than last year. Another favorable indication is that the church is becoming more inclined to Methodism. The Methodist Church is dying for the want of Methodism in many localities.

I have published two sermons, one on election and the other on apostasy, for the use of the church on the district. I have several hundred copies still on hand. They may be used to advantage in certain sections.

Our district meeting will be held in this place, commencing on the twenty-ninth of July, and not on the twenty-sixth, as published. It will embrace the first Sabbath in August. We hope Bishop McTyeire will be able to attend. Ample provision will be made for all who may come.

GREENVILLE, July 8, 1874.

HONORARY DEGREES.—We learn through a letter from a friend that at the recent commencement of Wofford College, South Carolina, the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on Rev. Weyman H. Potter, presiding elder of the Atlanta district, North Georgia Conference; Rev. Samuel B. Jones, president of Columbia Female College, South Carolina Conference; and Rev. James S. Kennedy, president of Asheville Female College, Holston Conference. It is our pleasure to know all these brethren, and to express our gratification at this recognition of their distinguished worth and ability as gospel ministers. Southern Christian Advocate.

PLEASURE is precarious, but virtue is immortal.

Letter from Massachusetts.

MR. EDITOR: This being the season of the anniversaries of literary institutions, we have enjoyed the privilege. That of the Sunday school was the first—on the twenty-fourth—and was of a marked character. Addresses were delivered by strangers from abroad, of the most interesting kind, having present Laisun, the Chinese commissioner from their government. He was a true specimen of that country in person and costume of the nation, with his shaven head and pig-tail, as it is called, with loose robes, one above another, and made an impression not to be forgotten—one which would have amused and interested the Sunday school children of New Orleans. He spoke in our language well enough to be understood, and his hesitation in the selection of some words to express his thoughts increased the interest, more than to detract from it. He began by the derivation of the days of the week—Sunday from the worship of the sun; Monday from that of the moon; Tuesday, of Tuisco; Wednesday, Woden; Thursday, Thor; Friday, Frigga; Saturday, that of Saturn. He said that they had no Sabbath in China, for they were all idolaters. He drew a most striking contrast between the heathen and civilized world, where the Sabbath was consecrated for the worship of Christ our Savior, and the Sunday schools for the instruction of the young in the Scriptures. He said he had heard gentlemen on the cars and in other places, where he was traveling about in this country, express their admiration of Confucius, as if his doctrines and principles were superior to Christianity. He said in plain language that they were fools. It was true that there were many good precepts which had kept the nation together for thousands of years, one of which was the exacting of obedience of children to their parents; but what had he done for millions of the poor? They were the most degraded beings. They still kept up the practices, in many places, of destroying their female infants. Even the mothers themselves would cast them away as soon as born. Their ology was that the girls could not do anything for them in old age, and the boys could, and if married they were no more to them, but like slaves to their husbands. But in civilized countries, where Christ was worshiped, how changed her social position! On this subject he was eloquent. There was vitality in the religion of Jesus. He felt it in his own soul, and his eyes sparkled with intense delight. The beauty and loveliness of Christianity had given to woman influence and respect unknown among all the isms of the Eastern world, which he named, now existing, with their abominations. Madam Laisun, his wife, was present—a true Chinese woman, though Christianized. Both of them belong to a Congregational church in Springfield, Massachusetts. Her face shone with peculiar pleasure, and her little almond-shaped eyes sparkled with a glow of light. We were introduced to both, and cordially invited to visit them and their family of children at home, which we design to do. They were acquainted with our missionary, Bro. Lambuth, in Shanghai, from whom a recent letter was received here, saying that Mrs. Lambuth was very much in need of a lady teacher to assist her in their school. Who will go?

We attended the celebration of the Wesleyan Academy, at its closing scenes for the year. Thirty-eight graduates received their diplomas—young ladies and gentlemen—a little Chinaman among their number, who may carry back to the heathen world the light of intelligence to aid in dispelling the cloud of moral darkness which now reigns in that benighted land. The Chinese pupils who were sent out under the protection of their government, in every department, are doing well here, and at other academies are progressing.

This school is flourishing, and the name of Fisk, the sainted founder of its literary position in the Methodist Church, is still hallowed, and his memory is like ointment poured forth, with an undying fragrance. Few only of the members of the old alumni are living. The meeting of the few brought the gush of tears from past recollections. For a boarding school establishment, where so many are collected, this is a model of order unrivaled. A collation for over two hundred was served with the beauty of quietness seldom seen. Refreshments of the best kind were abundant. At the close they sang some hymns designed for the purpose, and then some sprightly songs. And then three cheers for the president and teachers, all with cheerful spirits and happy hearts.

The scenery around is now redolent with beauty; its trees, its verdant lawns for play grounds, all in harmony with the joys of youth. The trees planted by Dr. Fisk are now lofty shades, soon to arch all the avenues, and give inspiration to the future muse of meditative students who may sit under their shadows, when all now living has passed away.

"Some there are
By their good deeds exalted, lofty minds,
And meditative authors of delight
And happiness, which to the end of time
Will live and spread and flourish."

DEATH OF REV. JOHN CARTER.—The Rev. John Carter died rather suddenly on the sixteenth of June, at Huntsville, Alabama. He rode sixteen miles, and preached with spirit and unction on the fourteenth.

Notes from an Agent.

MR. EDITOR: Everybody in St. Louis talks about Shaw's Garden, Lafayette Park, the new Merchants' Exchange, the custom-house and the great bridge.

I saw another wonder or two—the great pork establishment of Maxwell, Sealing and Mulhall. During the hottest weather of June they were killing six hundred hogs daily. The process begins at four A. M. By ten A. M. the meat is all put away, in ice. The following day it is packed in salt. Where the meat is salted the atmosphere is winter-like. Into this immense room, come, through vast tubes and from the ice-rooms below, constant currents of cold air, suggestive to a Texan, I should think, of the Norther. This house supplies large amounts of meat to the South, and ship also to Europe. The firm contributed to the college, while Mr. Maxwell, a warm-hearted man and a Methodist, gave also individually.

In the course of my calls in the city I found a gentleman who, after giving for the college, thanked me for calling upon him—actually thanked me, and that with evident, sincere cordiality. He is an Episcopalian, rejoicing in the good work of Methodists. Of course I inquired further about this singularly generous man. An old resident's characteristic reply was: "He is the whitest man in St. Louis." Several generous deeds were related illustrating the unique description. Blessings on such men as Joseph A. Branch. He is chief of the house of Branch, Crooks & Co., manufacturing saws, circular and all others.

I became acquainted with the famous Dr. J. H. McLean, whose medicines go all over this country and are ordered from Europe. The doctor is full of enterprise and an earnest Methodist. He espouses the college with interest, and showed the agent much kindness.

I shall remember with pleasure the three or four scores of contributors who made my visit to the city agreeable and useful.

General Sherman happened in the city during my stay. Supposing he had money, and the generous feeling of a soldier toward those he once fought so vigorously, I called on him. The general was courteous, and remembered Meridian, but had not a dollar for us.

I met a German man who said we ought to be willing to send our children to public schools with negro children. Said I: "Would you send yours?" A little hesitant, he said he would. "You belong to a different class of whites from our people," I replied. We parted friendly, however, himself modifying his views of Southerners.

Coming home I touched at Cairo and Nashville, gathering some money for the college, much good will and not a few encouraging promises of future aid.

On reaching Meridian I find the prospect of the college more inspiriting than at any previous period. The community are enthusiastic in praise of the school, the good work of which came so impressively to view in the examination and other exercises of the late commencement week.

Meridian is the center of a large country, throughout which the white people will always largely predominate, as they now do. It is wisdom in the church and in the people at large to build, at this convenient, healthful center, a broad, permanent institution for the education of those who are to impress their characters on the succeeding population. Men and women of goodness and wealth will see this opportunity of doing a great good, and will consecrate their means to enlarge and endow East Mississippi Female College. Will they not? Let them address the agent,

JOHN A. ELLIS.

MERIDIAN, Mississippi.

Another Great Chicago Fire.

Chicago is again afflicted with a fire. For years that unfortunate city has been a prey to epidemics of conflagrations. The fire seems to have commenced in the same way as the great fire of 1871—it was a small flame until fanned by the wind from the lake into a blaze. All efforts to stop it were useless; the people became panic-stricken, as well they might with their previous experiences, and the firemen commenced fighting the fire in the same unfortunate way tried before—that of blowing up houses with gunpowder—with the same result—no stoppage of the fire.

According to the telegrams this fire seems to have traveled on the same line as the previous one, from Third avenue to Wabash avenue, some five or six squares. It is confidently expected to burn out to the lake, one square more. Late dispatches announce that the fire has been stopped on Harrison street, just where the former fire was put an end to. If this is so, the business portion of the city will suffer but little, and the loss be confined almost entirely to residences, among them some of the finest in the city. Although the loss in money may be less, it is greatly to be feared lest the loss in human lives may not be greater.—Picayune, July 15.

THE FIRST BALE.—The first bale of cotton from this year's crop was yesterday forwarded, per Southern Express Company, by Messrs. Gordon & Gomila, of New Orleans, to Messrs. Woodward & Stillman, of New York.

College Changes.

The changes in our Methodist colleges, says the New York Methodist, this commencement season, have been much greater than usual, both in number and importance. Chancellor Winchell retires from the administration of the Syracuse University, and takes the more congenial post of professor; the trustees have signified their appreciation of his worth by a six months' leave of absence for European travel, with full salary. Dr. E. O. Haven, secretary of the Church's Educational Board, succeeds to the chancellorship. Dr. Winchell will, in his new position, have more leisure for the literary tasks to which he is committed; in the line which he has chosen he is the most successful writer known to American Methodism. Dr. Haven has given full proof of his skill as the head of a great school; he is in just the position which his friends would desire for him.

Dr. Cummings continues at the head of the Wesleyan University at Middletown. The demand that he should remain has induced him to reconsider his purpose of retiring. We regard him as one of our best college presidents. Under his care the Wesleyan has risen rapidly in rank, wealth and number of students. His separation from it would, we think, be a serious blow to its best interests. At Dickinson all the chairs, that of the president excepted, were declared vacant. Profs. Himes and Harman were re-elected; new men, Messrs. Rittenhouse and Lippincott, were placed in the other chairs. These changes have been made in the hope of composing differences of long standing in the faculty. Dr. George Loomis retires from the presidency of Allegheny College after a long and useful administration. We have not learned the name of the successor to Dr. F. H. Newhall, who has not been able, from ill health, to assume the presidency of the Ohio Wesleyan University. In the long season of suffering from which he is emerging he has had, and will continue to have, the sympathy of us all.

We do not wish to see the spirit or the practice of the Itinerancy carried into our colleges. The restlessness, which is the natural result of our ministerial polity, somewhat affects our schools. Officers change frequently to the great detriment of the institutions. Some are drafted into the episcopacy; others into secretaryships and editorships; others grow weary of teaching, and enter the pastorate. The men profit, no doubt, by these transitions, but the schools suffer. We have never ceased to wish that Dr. Durbin had remained at the head of Dickinson, and Dr. Thomson in the presidency of the Ohio Wesleyan University; and we sincerely rejoice that Dr. Haven is back again in a position which he adorns so well. The trouble, however, is that continuance for a long term at the head of a college which is continually struggling with poverty is a sacrifice very few men are willing to make. Disgust and despair drive them to other fields of labor. Happily our schools are passing beyond the stage of utter penury. They are not rich, but still can live and give their faculties a decent maintenance. They need much more than they yet have; and we beg especially the wealthy laymen of eastern Pennsylvania and Maryland to cherish the institution committed to their keeping. They will honor themselves by being liberal patrons of learning.

In the perfecting of its higher education our country is advancing with rapid steps. More has been effected in the last fifteen years than in a half century before. Yale, Princeton, Harvard, the University of Pennsylvania and Columbia College in New York have been enriched with ample revenues. We Methodists cannot afford to lag behind in the march. It has been said by the skeptical that the narrowness of denominational life precludes the growth, out of it, of a complete university. Let us prove the contrary; we are abundantly able.

THE New Orleans Picayune says: "An old and greatly respected merchant has left us. Mr. Joseph Carroll died on the seventh of July last, at Charlotte, North Carolina. He was a native of the Isle of Wight county, Virginia, and had resided in this city for thirty years. During this period he was largely engaged in business, and ever maintained the reputation of a liberal, enterprising and patriotic citizen, a kind friend and benevolent gentleman. Despite his large business connection and cares, he never neglected his public duties, but always bore his share of responsibility and duty in all our political crises. In the eventful period preceding secession he was an active and useful member of the Legislature of the State. But it was chiefly in the sphere of a great merchant that Mr. Carroll rendered the most conspicuous services to his fellow-men. In this sphere he passed successfully through the most troublous time unscathed and undismayed, and his latter days of prolonged illness were relieved by the consciousness of having borne well and honestly his part in the drama of life."

DR. E. O. HAVEN is announced as accepting the chancellorship of Syracuse University, from which Dr. Winchell has lately retired.

IT IS not till the storm comes that we find out the real building and timber of a vessel.—Miss Muloch.

THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1874.

TO ONE OF LITTLE FAITH.

"I said, O that I had wings like a dove; for then would I fly away and be at rest."

Nay, friend, endure with meekness
The ills of mortal life—
Its loneliness and weakness,
Its bitterness and strife.
Seek not to rest thy spirit
Upon its surging wave,
Nor with its scalding waters
Thy fevered brow to lave.

Though trusted hearts may waver,
Grow weary and estranged,
Thy Father's loving favor,
Unwearied and unchanged,
Shall be thy sure protection;
Though fears and foes invade,
Trusting in his affection
Thou canst not be dismayed.

What though thy soul be riven
By earth's appalling wrong?
Faint not! To thee is given "To suffer and be strong."
Look not for sign or token;
The promise is secure.
The word which God has spoken
Forever shall endure!

Press forward! Never falter
Where Truth betrayed, enthralled,
Before her blood-stained altar,
Invokes the throne of God!
Let no dark thoughts confound thee;
On yonder heights sublime
The hosts of God surround thee:
Trust him—and wait his time.

Funeral Discourse on the Hon. W. L. Sharkey.

Judge Sharkey, it will be remembered, died in Washington city. A committee was appointed by the Legislature of Mississippi to go to Washington and convey the remains to Jackson for interment. The funeral services were held in the hall of the House of Representatives, at the capital, in Jackson, Mississippi, on the fifth of May. The Rev. C. B. Galloway, the officiating minister, delivered the following discourse on the occasion:

It is not my purpose, on this solemn occasion, when a grateful people have assembled to receive the mortal remains of their honored dead, to pronounce a eulogy on his life and public services; that has been ably done by one no less distinguished than himself. But I propose to speak more particularly of his inner life—of those facts and characteristics which attracted around him a large circle of admiring friends, made home a happy retreat, and left behind the testimony of his acceptance with God. It is pleasant to embalm in everlasting remembrance the worthy deeds of our deceased, which gave them high position in the public esteem; but it is sweeter far to think of their tender excellencies of heart, of their triumph over death, and of their peaceful rest and angel companionship in the home of the blest. We may delight to trace their honored achievements here, which rendered them immortal in the pages of history and the hearts of their countrymen; but this delight is heightened a thousand-fold to know that, after their well-earned earthly renown, they wear crowns of amaranth which shall fade not throughout the unfoldings of the eternal years. It is glorious to die a hero, but it is thrice glorious to die a Christian. And when we find one who combines at once the courage and high resolve of the hero, with the virtues and transcendent faith of the Christian, that character is invested with a halo peculiarly divine. Thus we venerated the immortal Washington, whose dauntless bravery made him "first in war," whose wise counsel made him "first in peace," and the harmonious blending of his chivalric patriotism and Christian purity "first in the hearts of his countrymen." Judge Sharkey was a hero in the field of thought. He had the courage to advance opinions, born of deep conviction, and the inflexible purpose to maintain them, though at variance with his most cherished and honored friends. He was a devotee to principle. In determining action he asked not what was expedient, but what was right. With this he combined a tender sympathy and broad Christian charity.

The rarest excellencies of character in public men are most generally unobserved by the masses. These are known only as they give color and expression to public and official duty. Distinguished men are studied in the light of their distinguished deeds. The warrior's history is read in the field of battle, where his skill and heroism achieved his country's triumph. The jurist's ability is known in the strength and grasp of his wise decisions; while in the inner and secret beauties of heart and life, which gave greatness and consistency to his public career, are unknown and unsung. For this reason Macaulay, the profound historian of England, said that Boswell's Life of Johnson was the only real biography ever written. Because he has given us a view behind the vail of domestic sanctity, and introduced us to the renowned Englishman as a private man in every-day life, disrobed of public reserve. And here we find the true index of his wonderful life. The sparkling rivulet may be seen, and we may be entranced with the music of its silvery voice, while the living fountain from which it springs may be in some secret, subterraneous cavern. Thus it was with the honored son of Mississippi, whose body we are this day to repose within her warm and friendly bosom. In his home, where sweet peace and happiness were the guardian angels, if not most heroic and distinguished, he was most noble and beloved. If upon the bench or before his countrymen he displayed the treasures of a well-stored mind, in his quiet, peace-loving home he exhibited the rare jewels of a tender heart. If his legal attainments and political virtues were great, his heart-culture and social excellencies were transcendent. Thus his memory is held in grateful esteem by hundreds of sorrowing friends who know his worth, while a stricken wife, bereft of a tender, loving, noble companion, awaits patiently the Master's summons in lonely grief.

But however much we may admire these charming traits of mind and heart, we are most interested to know of his Christian death and heavenly hope. Did he meet and conquer the last enemy without fear, and, dying, bequeath to us a Christian's faith and a Christian's triumph? Thank God, his lonely widow has such a comforting assurance, and his countrymen such a heritage of consolation. When the death-messenger came he was greeted with a smile, and he willingly obeyed his welcomed summons. For many years Judge Sharkey was a regular, devout communicant in the Methodist Church, and attended strictly to all his Christian duties. But the harsh and unchristian treatment of a member of his church with whom he most tenderly sympathized, by one in authority, together with his unsettled political life, which necessitated his change of residence, led him for some years to neglect the obligations of the Christian. During this period, however, he never failed to attend the services of the sanctuary when opportunity afforded. His private prayer was not forgotten, while the study of God's word was his great delight. When disease laid its heavy hand upon him, and he felt his tottering steps hastening to the grave, his thoughts dwelt largely on the eternal beyond. His soul thirsted for the water of life, and his eyes were cast on Jesus, who alone can supply. In this condition he was visited by Bishop Keener some days before his death, from whose hands he received the holy communion, and to whom he gave evidence of his humble faith in God, and his readiness to depart and be with Christ. Thus he rested calmly in the arms of his Savior until Death closed his eyes and hushed his heart-throbs, and his mighty soul, guarded by "helmed seraphim and sworded cherubim," returned to the God who gave it. Blessed thought! that, after earth's toils and tears, no cloud rests upon his noble brow.

To the weeping widow, whose wounds of sorrow are opened afresh to-day, I would say: Sorrow not as those who have no hope. There is another and a better life, and your distinguished loved one has entered upon that blissful inheritance.

"There is no union here of hearts
That hath not here an end."

But, thank God, there may be a reunion in heaven, never to be disturbed by a single parting. May this, then, be the earnest prayer of your swelling, desolate heart: "God give me strength to bear, hope to cheer, courage to labor and faith to conquer." And at last may you meet the loved and lost in the bright mansions above, where the sword and shield are exchanged for a crown and palm.

To his countrymen I would say: Emulate the virtues of your distinguished dead. The judicial ermine he honorably and proudly wore for many years, and in advanced age laid it aside without wrinkle or stain. Positions of public trust and responsibility he faithfully filled with the conscientiousness of a man of God, and in the evening of a well-spent life yielded them up without a whisper against his untarnished honor and high-born motives. His life was spent in unremitting toil and patient search after light and knowledge. Some time before his death he made this remark to a friend: "In looking back over my life, I regret that I have learned so little." These are golden words, from a great and wise man, and should be graven deep in the hearts of the young men of Mississippi. And God grant that in imitating his industry they may emulate his purity. While, then, we lay his lifeless body to rest within the soil of the State he served so long and loved so well, we commend his unsullied character, unsuspicioned honor and Christian death to the grateful memory of his countrymen. Guard it with a Christian's love and a patriot's care. We would not have him sleep in the burying ground of the nation's capital, with strange hands to tend his grave, and where strangers alone would read his epitaph. No! we would deposit his sacred ashes in the bosom of his beloved Mississippi, where his sorrowing friends may drop a tear over his tomb, and coming generations be reminded of his worthy deeds. In Mississippi's Pantheon no grander figure has a place than William L. Sharkey. Lay him tenderly to rest under the smiling heavens of his sunny South. And may the flowers bloom brightly, and the winds sigh gently, and the birds sing sweetly over his peaceful grave.

Woodville District Conference.

The Woodville District Conference convened at Clinton, Louisiana, June 26, 1874. J. L. Forsyth, presiding elder, in the chair.

On motion all committees were dispensed with, save the committee on public worship.

Inquiry was then made by the president into the condition of the several charges in the district, in their regular order, as follows:

1. "As to their spiritual state," etc. The answers to this first question were given, by the several preachers in charge and lay delegates from the different circuits, in a detailed manner, calculated to give the Conference a thorough insight into the spiritual condition of our people within the limits of this district. In some instances the character of the reports was indeed gloomy, showing a falling off in true earnestness among seekers after life eternal. But these clouds do not cast their somber shadows over the whole, and the hearts of the Conference were made glad by the conclusion that in the aggregate the spiritual state of the church in this district is good—even prosperous, which prosperity is exhibited by increased attendance upon the ordinances and a greater number of social meetings of the church.

2. "As to missions within the district," etc. Under this head P. S. Petty, preacher in charge, made a favorable report of the progress of the church within the mission, and upon motion it was Resolved, That the Annual Conference be, and hereby is requested to make Homochitto mission a circuit.

Rev. J. A. Godfrey then read an article from the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE relative to a new paper, Our Missionary, soon to be issued by the Board of Missions; whereupon it was

Resolved, That as a Conference we are highly gratified to learn the intention of the Missionary Board as to the publication of a monthly paper in support of the cause of missions, and that we will do all we can to secure subscribers for said paper, Our Missionary.

On motion of Rev. R. B. Downer the following resolution was then adopted:

Resolved, That we as a Conference do heartily indorse the pamphlet, "Go or Send," a prize essay on missions, by Atticus G. Haygood, and request our people to procure and read it.

3. "As to Sunday schools," etc. Reports having been called for under this head, the representatives of the different circuits or stations told the condition of the schools among them.

These reports were varied, and, like those under the head of the first question, gave us much cause of regret. The great obstacle to the establishment and maintenance of Sunday schools, from the reports, seems to be the distressed condition of an impoverished people.

Pride, which cannot be altogether deprecated when applied in such instances as the present, prevents many parents from sending their little ones to the place of holy teaching because they are unable to furnish proper attire.

From Meadville, Woodville, Jackson, Clinton and other points excellent reports were received, and in spite of the darkness which overshadows many places we are forced to the conclusion that Sunday schools within the district, taking it as a whole, are doing well.

4. "As to financial systems," etc. Under this question concise reports were had from the various charges within the district, which can be summed up as follows:

Financial systems varied, but that of assessment or contribution mostly used.

Contributions to church purposes very limited, because the people are absolutely without money, and many almost without food. Preachers get little or no money, but in nearly every locality the people are liberal in dividing their provisions with them. Many of the preachers are laboring hard at the plow for means of sustenance.

Churches and parsonages generally in good condition; some need repairs, but arrangements are being or have been made for putting them in proper order.

The reports being ended, the Conference went into an election of delegates to the next Annual Conference, with the following result: Delegates: Rev. J. E. Jagers, W. H. Grillin, G. H. Wiley and J. D. Nettles. Alternates: L. K. Barbour and Thomas White.

The following resolutions were then adopted:

Resolved, That as a Conference we cordially and earnestly commend Centenary College to our people and to citizens generally who desire to send their sons to school or college. That we indorse the president and faculty of said institution as a well-qualified and efficient corps of educators, and that we will devote our best energies to the upbuilding and sustenance of Centenary College.

Resolved, That as a Conference we respectfully request the next Mississippi Annual Conference to so modify the present rule of election of delegates to the District Conferences as to allow the election of one delegate from each church to the District Conference on circuits and missions where there are more than four churches in one charge, each pastorate to remain, as now, entitled to four delegates; and that the presiding elder be and hereby is requested to present this resolution to the next Annual Conference.

Resolved, That each preacher in charge of this district be and is hereby required to make his report at our next District Conference, embracing the answers to the questions in the Discipline, in writing, and in the regular order in which they are asked.

Resolved, That the thanks of this District Conference be and they are hereby tendered to the citizens of Clinton for the hearty welcome and hospitable entertainment which they have tendered to its members.

The president then asked the question: "Where will you hold your next District Conference?" The vote being taken, it was decided in favor of Liberty, Mississippi.

On motion the Conference adjourned sine die.

Altogether our Conference was a pleasant and happy reunion of brethren, co-workers in the great cause of our blessed Redeemer.

The session lasted two days, and on the second day Rev. C. G. Andrews, Prof. G. H. Wiley, Rev. John B. Higginbotham and L. P. Day took their seats as members of the Conference.

Service was held at the church on the evening of Saturday, the last day of the session, and most of the delegates remained in attendance.

Rev. C. G. Andrews preached one of his characteristic, touching and logical sermons at eleven o'clock on Sunday, on the verity of the Bible, which was listened to with the deepest interest by a large congregation.

At four P. M. a love-feast was held, with a good attendance, and the outpouring of Christian experience, showing the ups and downs of the pilgrim on his way to the celestial city, was truly affecting.

Service at night, which was unusually well attended, closed our happy Conference, which leaves our hearts lighter and our determination stronger to do our Master's will.

Marianna District Conference.

MR. EDITOR: The Marianna District Conference of the Alabama Conference was held at Marianna, Jackson county, Florida, commencing June 24, 1874. Introductory sermon by Rev. C. L. Calhoun. Text, the latter clause of the sixth verse of the fourth chapter of Nehemiah: "For the people had a mind to work." Our brother delivered a very appropriate discourse, suitable to all, teaching the church the necessity of work.

On Thursday at nine A. M. the Conference opened by prayer meeting, conducted by our worthy presiding elder, M. E. Butt. The district was well represented for the season of the year. The business of the Conference, upon the whole, was gratifying to all in attendance.

The subject of education was introduced to the Conference on Thursday afternoon by Rev. E. Phillips, president of the Marianna High School, at Ozark. The duty of educating the children of the church was presented to the Conference, by our worthy presiding elder, in some very forcible and appropriate remarks, urging the church to the support of our schools. Judging from what we have seen on this district, education is the great want of a large majority of the people. Marianna and vicinity seem to be taking the lead in this direction, judging from their Sunday school celebration on Friday night. Bro. Nichols, the superintendent, deserves great credit for his careful attention in selecting such suitable pieces for the occasion, and all the teachers showed that they not only felt the necessity of Sabbath schools, but their whole heart and soul is in the work. The children seemed to have caught the same spirit, which was proven by several additions to the church from the Sunday school. It was the most interesting celebration I ever witnessed. It was opened by a suitable march; then a prayer by Rev. M. E. Butt, which was followed by a very witty and spicy introductory address by a little boy, requesting the attention of the older people. This was followed by a song of praise. Then came the "Monument of Truth," which was built as a representation of their Sabbath school. The stone was first laid, then a tablet of Faith placed upon it—"Faith" in large letters; next in order came Virtue, then Knowledge, Temperance, Patience, Godliness, Brotherly Kindness, Charity. Then suddenly one came forward and placed a dove upon the monument, saying: "Behold, the heavens were opened, and a spirit like a dove descended upon Jesus; and lo! a voice came from heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." After this came a poem of great interest and beauty, by one of the young ladies of the school.

Vicksburg District Conference.

MR. EDITOR: This body met at Natchez, Mississippi, June 25, 1874, with Rev. F. M. Featherstun, presiding elder, in the chair. The attendance was not full, yet the session was very interesting.

The disciplinary questions were asked and answered in the usual order, eliciting much important information and many wise suggestions.

With regard to spiritual condition, attendance upon ordinances and Sunday schools the reports were generally good.

The reports on financial systems were somewhat remarkable. In several places, where they said they had no system at all, they paid their preacher all his dues most promptly. We do not infer from this that financial systems are of no use, but that some pastoral charges do better without any financial plan than others do with the best that can be devised.

On the subject of temperance the Conference resolved: "That as pastors and members of the church of God we will give diligent and constant attention to the proper administration of the law of our church upon the subject of intemperance."

The committee on education, of which Ex-Governor Humphreys was chairman, strongly recommended Port Gibson Collegiate Academy as a suitable and convenient place to educate the daughters of our people.

The report of the committee on revisal and consolidation, requesting the Bishop and his council, at our next Annual Conference, to consider the propriety of consolidating, in many instances, two or more pastoral charges, and placing two or more preachers on each work, was adopted after considerable debate.

The Conference resolved to petition the Annual Conference to make the number of representatives to which each pastoral charge shall be entitled in the District Conference two, instead of four, as the law now is.

A communication was received from Rev. Dr. Stratton, pastor of the Presbyterian congregation, extending the fraternal greetings of his people to us, and asking that his pulpit might be filled on Sunday morning and afternoon by members of our body. The fraternal greetings were heartily reciprocated and ministers appointed to fill his pulpit.

B. G. Humphreys, Thomas Reed, William J. Lum and S. L. Guice were elected delegates to the next Annual Conference, and W. J. Carroll and J. G. Guice alternates.

The presence of the Conference seemed to be greatly enjoyed by the people of Natchez, as was witnessed by the large congregations at the Sunday morning service and communion, at the afternoon love-feast, and especially on Sunday night.

Vicksburg was selected as the place for holding the next session of the Conference.

Finally, Mr. Editor, we did not forget to resolve, before we adjourned on Saturday evening, "That we do again most cordially recommend our Conference paper, the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, to the patronage of our people."

AT the second Quarterly Conference for Lower Peachtree circuit, Selma district, Alabama Conference, held at Independence, June 6, 1874, the following preamble and resolutions were offered by Rev. A. C. Hundley and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, It has pleased an all-wise Providence to remove from our midst our beloved brother, TILMAN INLOW, who for many years was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and an efficient member of the Quarterly Conference; And whereas, We deeply deplore the loss from our church of such a good and useful member in the several capacities of laborer in which he has served; And whereas, We feel that his place among us cannot well be supplied; And whereas, We with Christian fortitude submit to the will of God, we rejoice to know that he died the death of the righteous, leaving the blessed assurance with his family and friends that he has gone to rest with God in peace; therefore

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the bereaved family and relatives of our departed brother, and that we will bear them up in our prayers to God, that he may bless them with all things needful, both for time and eternity.

DIED, near Edwards' Depot, Hinds county, Mississippi, May 6, 1874, WILLIAM B., third son of John and Jane Hamberlin, aged fifty years seven months and twenty-six days.

He had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South for twenty-eight years, during which time he adorned his high calling of God with an holy life, a firm hope and an abiding faith. His was a life that truly justified the utterance of the Holy Ghost: "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." On January 28, 1846, he was married to Miss Mary P. McAlpin, with whom he lived in the truest connubial affection until 1870, when she went up among the angels, six of whom were their own children, and leaving six to be reared for God and a better clime. His was a very weak physical build, and he suffered much and long; but he endured as seeing him who is invisible. When the last great struggle of nature came, and the relentless grip of death held him and would not let go, and even in the excruciating pains of pneumonia, he realized the Scripture truth that death hath no sting to the dying Christian. As gently fades the autumn leaf he fell asleep in the arms of Jesus, to awake in the last times in his likeness. Rest, dear brother!

"Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee,
Whose God was thy ransom, thy guardian and guide;
He gave thee, he took thee, and he will restore thee;
And death has no sting, for the Savior has died."

O may the family chain that has been so often broken upon earth be reformed around the throne of God in heaven, without the loss of a single link!

MRS. MARIA LOUISA MAGRUDER, wife of Dr. A. L. C. Magruder, and last surviving child of George and Charlotte Newman, of Washington, Adams county, Mississippi, died in Macon, Georgia, May 30, 1874, in the fifty-ninth year of her age.

She was converted and joined the Methodist Church at Washington, Adams county, Mississippi, in the year 1836, and continued to "adorn the doctrine of God her Savior by a well-ordered life and godly conversation," in the exercise of a "meek and quiet spirit," until the close of her life. She was found patiently waiting all the remaining "days of her appointed time until her change came." Reared in affluence, no effort was spared in the culture of her mind, and the graces of her spirit culminated in an amiableness of manner and disposition rarely attained. Touched by the Spirit of God, her excellent colloquial powers were devoted to the edification and delight of all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. She was an affectionate wife, always ready to meet her now sorrowing husband, day or night, with a smile and hearty welcome. For the last twelve months nearly her constant occupation was reading her Bible and prayer. A few days before her death she said to the doctor: "Do you know how long we have been married?" He said: "Yes; if we live to see the eleventh of next December we will have been married forty years." She replied: "Few persons can say what we can, that we have lived together so long, and never had anything to disturb or interrupt our happiness." On Friday morning she called her husband to her and said: "You might as well prepare to give your wife up. I am going to die. I am ready and willing to go, and have wondered for some time why the Lord has not taken me." On Saturday morning previous to her death, after breakfast, she requested her faithful servants to dress her. She then sent for her husband and said: "Kiss me." He seated himself by her and imparted the kiss. She smiled and seemed perfectly satisfied. This was her last request. She refused all food during the day, only drinking a cup of tea, indicating that my dear, sainted friend, conscious to the last, spent the few remaining hours of her probation in fasting and prayer. She died without a struggle, as peacefully as the calm, serene Sabbath morn which smiled upon her pulseless form.

At five o'clock on Sabbath afternoon a large concourse of friends and acquaintances assembled at her residence, and among them nearly every physician in the city, to offer the last mournful tribute of respect to the pious dead. Her funeral sermon was preached by her beloved pastor, Rev. James O. Branch, of whose charge she had been a member for ten years. The address was appropriate and very touching. May our kind heavenly Father comfort the bereaved husband, and may the hour of his departure find him "ready."

A FRIEND.

AT Magnolia, Marengo county, Alabama, about eleven o'clock A. M. on the thirtieth of April, 1874, there went up to the shining courts of heaven, accompanied by white-winged angels, the pure spirit of SAMMY B. CONNOR, there to join in the seraphic strains of praise around the throne of God. For several hours before he was released from earth his suffering was exceedingly great, causing him to be very restless, and insensible of the presence of his dear parents and many other affectionate relatives and friends, all of whom would have heard the last word he should say on earth; but a few moments before his last was breathed, tranquilly and without a murmur he was removed hence, "like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

This morning he is not with us in school, but answers "Here" to his precious name as it is repeated from the roll of heaven. Sammy was just entering upon his seventeenth summer. During the last three years of his life he had been under the immediate tuition of the writer, who takes pleasure in saying that he was a noble boy. In his department the elements of the true gentleman were always manifest. In his disposition he was amiable and affectionate, especially to his brothers and sisters, of whom he leaves six, in all, to mourn his loss. He had many honorable traits of character, but most especially was he distinguished for his truthfulness. He was scrupulously truthful. We never knew him to deviate therefrom. Under any circumstances he could be relied on.

He had a high appreciation of the value of education; hence he was diligent in the improvement of his time. He never participated in the amusements of the play ground unless he was fully satisfied he would know his lessons afterward. Frequently when his lessons were hard he would remain in the school-room during play-time and study. He was always regular at school, never being absent except when kept away by unavoidable circumstances.

In the summer of 1873 Sammy was impressed with the importance of preparing his heart for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit; consequently, without making any extraordinary outward manifestation, he connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, under the ministry of Rev. S. A. Pilley, at that time his pastor. Subsequent to that time nothing was observed in him unworthy the vows he had taken; so far as was in his power, we think he tried to live a Christian.

He was buried on the first day of May. The Sunday school, in procession, followed his dear remains to the grave. On the way was sung "Beautiful River," and just before his body was consigned to its native dust the sweet song he was wont and which he loved to sing, "Over There," was sung.

M. D. T.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

Whereas, God in his providence, the wisdom of whose ways is beyond human comprehension, has visited our Sunday school, and has seen fit to take therefrom SAMUEL B. CONNOR, who departed this life on the thirtieth of April, 1874, we, as teachers and classmates, submit with humble resignation to this dispensation of Providence, and take this occasion of expressing the respect we entertain for him; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That in this sad bereavement the Magnolia Sunday school, of which he was a worthy and efficient member, and which he attended with a zeal and punctuality that were commendable and exemplary, has sustained no ordinary loss.

Resolved, That we feel deeply grieved thus to have one to whom we were so much attached so unexpectedly taken from us, and, as a token of our sorrow, that each member of the Sunday school wear a badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the bereaved family of the deceased, who have lost an obedient son and a kind and accommodating brother, praying that they may yield obedience and meek submission to that seemingly "frowning Providence behind which a smiling face is always hid."

THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1874.

WAITING.

"More than they that watch for the morning."

Come to us, Lord of love and light,
Come to the souls that watch and wait;
Wearily long has been the night,
And we see no dawn, though the hour is late.

Eagerly lift we our straining eyes,
Vainly trying to pierce the gloom,
Looking toward the Eastern skies,
If haply at last we may see thee come.

The sorrowful nations are needing thee;
The people in tumult are tossed about
Like the waves of the restless sea,
Moved by passion and hate and doubt.

We are groping amid the night,
And the hour is heavy with many a sigh.
Come to us, Master, with love and light,
Lest we fatal in the darkness, and droop and die.

But there comes a voice in the silence deep:
"Wait; be patient; it is not long;"
So we rose from our sorrow and no more weep,
But cheer the darkness with love and song.

Coming! coming! Oh, is it so?
Do we hear the sound of thy chariot wheels?
Savior, all else that we long to know
We will leave till thy wiser love reveals.

The hours pass slowly; the morning chime
Is long in sounding. But let us wait.
Soon we shall come to the end of time,
And see the Lord at the golden gate.

Savior, while passes our cheerless night,
And our souls ofttimes are weary and hopeless be,
We dream of that wonderful morning light
When our eyes shall open and look on thee.

Is Mohammedanism Increasing?

BY REV. CYRUS HAMLIN, D. D.,
President of Robert College, Constantinople.

Revival of Mohammedanism, or wane of Mohammedanism—which is true? We hear of late many bold and positive assertions, made from various sources, sometimes boastfully made, to the discredit of Christianity (as though the mere fact of progress could of itself prove or disprove anything,) that Mohammedanism is making more rapid advances than Christianity; that Mohammedan missionaries are more successful than Christian missionaries. It is doubtless true that Islam* is gaining in some places and losing in others. The reasons, both of the loss and the gain, we think, can be made apparent to the common judgment of men, and, if so, we shall render a service to many whose attention has recently been called to this subject.

In the great Ottoman empire, I am sure, Islam is on its wane. The crescent is no longer its true symbol. It no longer terrifies the nations. It no longer makes forced conversions. As a political power, all will acknowledge its day is past and gone. But the Koran is law as well as faith, and the Sultan of Turkey is the head, the glorious embodiment of the power and splendor of Islam. His highest and most solemn duty is to see that the banner of the faithful is everywhere triumphant. His present absolute dependence upon Europe has dimmed all this splendor. It has destroyed the unity and force of the faith. Left to itself, the empire would break up even without a foreign foe. Egypt and Arabia would take care of themselves, and defy the power of the capital. Servia, Roumania and all European Turkey would soon follow their example, and in some form or other claim autonomy. Now, where a faith is so much the source and inspiration to the State, and has, from its origin, claimed to control all authority, the loss of political power must essentially change the conditions of that faith.

The wane of Islam is further shown in the loss of the death penalty for defection from the faith. "The sword of Mohammed is the key of heaven and hell." But that sword, at the dictation of Europe, has been sheathed. Since then more defections have occurred in twenty years than in the preceding four hundred. Religious liberty is the rule of the Ottoman administration. This of itself is an invitation to the Islamite to think, to read and compare. Religious knowledge is increasing all over the empire. The Christian Scriptures are sought and read to a degree never dreamed of before. If you introduce religious topics in conversation, they will be treated in a calm and reasonable manner—not with the scorn or the haughty silence of former years. This is undeniably a great change, whatever may be its final results. It is a change, too, not confined to the capital or to any particular region, but is general over all parts of the empire. It is at least a softening down of the bigotry and fanaticism of the faith. Instead of adhering to its old path of blood, it now enters the paths of reason, thought, discussion. If you admit that in this it will have an advantage over Christianity, it is a sign of strength, otherwise of weakness and decay. Formerly it did not lend a ready ear to an opposing faith. It abhorred discussion. It demanded faith, not reason. If charged with difficulties and contradictions, it would calmly answer, "God is great," and retire into undisturbed repose. That day has gone by. Islam must now lay aside both the chibouk and the sword, and reason and talk and write in this reasoning, talking, writing age. It manifests, however, nothing of the great element of hope. It does not hold out to itself any great future, but largely accepts the popular impression that Christianity is to prevail.

Islam feels also, and very sensitively, the loss of military prestige. When the Ottoman empire enthroned itself on the Bosphorus it had a better appointed standing army than any European power could boast of. The Osmanlees displayed greater skill in the manufacture of arms and of all the materiel of war. Not only were their Damascene blades the wonder of Europe; they were equally superior in fire-arms, and especially in artillery. But when Europe entered upon her career of progress Turkey remained stationary. For a long period she enjoyed the fruits of her magnificent conquests, and then began to lose them. Her weakness has at length become such that she is safe only in the jealousies and rivalries of Europe. She has become a learner instead of a teacher in the art of war. European drill-masters have trained her armies. She cannot manufacture her own arms. After forty years of effort, and the expenditure of fabulous sums upon her workshops, she is compelled to get her steel cannon from Krupp, and her army rifles are made in Providence, Rhode Island. Such facts make thoughtful Moslems feel that their day is on the decline—their sun is in the West.

I think this feeling of discouragement is well founded. Islam entered Europe with the sword. It came to dictate, not to persuade. It came to rule and reign, not to preach and argue. It held in bitter scorn the corrupt Christianity which bowed down to statues and pictures and shrines and dead men's bones, and worshiped the Virgin Mary more than the infinite Jehovah. It deemed this a base idolatry, and rode triumphantly over its embattled hosts. But now this despised Christianity has risen in the West and North to wealth and power; to a civilization never dreamed of by the Moslem. He essays to copy it, to introduce it, but wholly fails. For some reason, which he cannot comprehend, European arts, inventions, sciences, are not transferable to Oriental soil. In regard to arts and arms, the empire is hopelessly in the rear, as compared with Europe, and Islam, occupying the most glorious position in the world, has proved itself incapable of coping with Christianity on the chosen ground of the arts of war.

Failure in anything else might be overlooked. In this it is unpardonable. It is decisive defeat. It must now abase its proud, imperious look, and confess that "the ghiaours" have not only surpassed them in wealth, science and industries, but also in the crowning and imperial art of war. I know of no subject upon which the intelligent Moslem is so sensitive as this. It forces him to confess that Islam has lost the day upon the high fields of power, and he has no compensating advantage to take refuge in. Among nominal Christians and Jews it makes no converts by persuasion, and among them it attempts no missionary work. It hopes for no gains. Formerly it recruited both the army and the harem from its Christian subjects. It now does neither. It can no longer seize upon Christian youth to form a janizary corps, nor upon Christian maidens for its households. This great source of its power is dried up. It has taken the sword, and in a very singular manner it is perishing by the sword in times of the profoundest peace. Its great army, badly housed, badly fed, badly cared for medically, decimated by malarious diseases and epidemics, is recruited entirely from Moslem citizens. They are taken for seven years from their labors and homes in the most valuable and productive period of life. This of itself is sufficient to account for the admitted fact that relatively to the Christian subjects of the empire the Moslems are losing ground. The Christians have no military service to perform, and what has been accorded to them in scorn is making them formidable in numbers. In what sense it can be said that Islam is gaining in this vast empire, or in Persia, I am at a loss to conceive.

There is another fact I would mention bearing upon this question. The great public charities of Islam, which have adorned some period of its history, have nearly all disappeared. Pilgrimages, prayer, fasting and almsgiving are the chief works of merit. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries works of charity were numerous and magnificent. Schools, caravansaries and hospitals of various kinds were built and well endowed. Lands and buildings, indestructible by fire, were placed under the care of the clergy for their support. Hardly one of them now exists. Some of the buildings were too solid to perish, but the funds are lost—"eaten up." No modern works of beneficence take their place. The age of charities, "of pious foundations," as they term them, has passed away. This is surely a sign of decadence, and one of great significance. I would not by any means deny that there is much to commend in Islam. It has great and noble truths with its errors. The Ottoman government has a commendable degree of impartiality. The Christian subject suffers certain evils which the Moslem subject does not; but on the whole I consider the balance of good in his favor, and that Christianity is winning the day. I will speak of Islam missions and their success, and the reasons of that success, in another number.—New York Observer.

* Allow me to use Islam instead of Mohammedism. It is the term in native use, and, as meaning submission, obedience, it is descriptive of a leading characteristic of the faith.

The Royal Jewels of Persia.

I went with the Turkish minister, an Italian, and a Russian lady to see the Shah's jewels, which are certainly the greatest sight in their way that the world can show. We presented ourselves at the palace, and were received by Yahya Khan, who took us out of the second and inner great court of the palace, into a small quadrangle, not far from the sacred precincts of the harem. We then went up a steep staircase to a small room about twenty feet by fourteen, where jewels to the value of six or seven millions were laid out on carpets at the far end of the room. Near the jewels, on a chair, sat the Mustaufial Mamalik, or Persian chancellor of the exchequer, and, being a Saiyid, wore the sacred color.

In such a show of gems as seemed to realize the wonders of Aladdin's lamp, the eye was too much dazzled and the memory too confused for description to be possible. But I remember that at the back of all was the Kalanian crown, and on either side of it two Persian lambskin caps, adorned with splendid aigrettes of diamonds. The crown itself was shaped like a flower-pot, with the small end open and the other closed. On the top of the crown was an uncut ruby, apparently without flaw, as large as a hen's egg. In front of the crown were dresses covered with diamonds and pearls; trays with necklaces of pearls, rubies and emeralds, and some hundreds of diamond, ruby and turquoise rings. In front of these, again, were gauntlets and belts covered with rubies and diamonds; and conspicuous among them the Kalanian belt, about a foot deep, weighing perhaps about eighteen pounds, and one complete mass of pearls, diamonds, emeralds and rubies. Still nearer to us stood a drinking-bowl, completely studded with enormous jewels; a tray full of foreign orders set in brilliants, and in front of all lay a dozen swords, one or two of which are worth a quarter of a million each. Along with these were epaulettes, covered with diamonds, and armlets so contrived that the brilliants revolved and kept up a continuous scintillation.

It was difficult, among so many, to single out particular gems. Perhaps, however, the first place ought to be assigned to the famous "Darya-l-Noor," or "Sea of Light," the sister diamond to our Punjab trophy, the "Koh-i-Nor," or "Mountain of Light." It is an inch and a half long, an inch broad, and three-eighths of an inch thick. It has the name Fath Ali Shah on one side, and the inscribing this name reduced the value of the diamond, so at least said Yahya Khan. It is a monstrous diamond, but not very brilliant. The Persians say that the "Sea of Light" and the "Mountain of Light" were jewels in the sword of Afrasiab, who lived 3,000 B. C. Rustum took them from Afrasiab, and they continued in the crown of Persia till they were carried away by Timour, from whom they descended to Mohammed Shah, King of Delhi, and Nadir brought them from India; but when he was slain Ahmed Shah Abdalil carried off the Koh-i-Nor, which descended to Shah Shuja, and was taken from him by Runjet Singh. The Darya Nor remained in Persia with the greater part of the other gems that Nadir brought from India.

Among the rings is one in which is set the famous Pitt diamond sent by George the Fourth to Fath Ali Shah. Another very large diamond is the Taji Hama, or Diadem of the Phœnix. It seemed as big as the top of a man's thumb. There is also the finest turquoise in the world, three or four inches long, and without a flaw, and a smaller one of unique beauty, three-quarters of an inch long and three-eighths of an inch broad. The color was lovely, and almost as refreshing to the eye as Persian poets pretend. There are also many sapphires as large as marbles, and rubies and pearls the size of nuts; and I am certain that I counted nearly a hundred emeralds from half an inch square to an inch and three-quarters long and an inch broad. In the sword scabbard, which is covered with diamonds, there is not perhaps a single stone smaller than the nail of a man's little finger. Lastly, there is an emerald as large as a walnut, covered with the names of the kings who had possessed it.—From Three Years' Diplomatic Residence in Persia, by Edward B. Eastwick.

Modern Dress.

Are we more civilized in our dress than in our dwellings? Not a whit. Our guide and ruler here is that irresponsible tyrant we call fashion, and neither comfort nor beauty has a word to say. To be sure men have discarded many absurdities, though they have retained more. They hold to their stiff shirt-collars, which rasp their necks; their wide expanse of linen front, which the very act of fastening ruffles; their meaningless swallow-tails, their hideous hats, their tight-fitting military uniform, and all the mysteries of seam and gusset and band, which are mere symbols of the art of cutting out, and not necessary to the comfort or shape. But, even with the follies they retain, they can move about with ease and unhampered. Women, on the contrary, torture themselves in the name of fashion with touching fidelity. They would as soon forego their nationality as their stays, and the thirty-nine articles are less sacred to them than their multiplicity of garments, all hanging from the waist. It is to keep these up, and to lessen their heavy weight, that they put themselves into steel cages which destroy all grace of line, and all comfort of movement, save in walking. The beauty of simplicity is a thing dead and done with in their code. Heads are loaded with false hair stuck about with lace, feathers, flowers and colored glass; ears are pierced that bits of crystallized earth, or imitations thereof, may be hung in the holes; health is destroyed, and the tender vital organs which nature has so sedulously protected by the outer casing of ribs are compressed and crushed that the waistband may be reduced to seventeen inches, and the highest efforts of millinery genius are directed to the most elaborate method of sewing one bit of stuff on to another bit of stuff, to the confusion of anything like a leading-line or an intelligible idea. We laugh at the Chinese "golden water lilies," the Papuan head-dress, the Hindoo nose-ring, the African lip-distender; we laugh while we look in the glass, and complacently brush out our frills, and congratulate ourselves on looking "stylish" and "well got up." But our highest efforts culminate in partial nakedness in the middle of winter, if we are women, in black broadcloth in the dog-days if we are men—in absurd lengths of silk trailing after us as we walk in the one case, in a ridiculous pennant meandering at our backs in the other; they culminate in fashion, not in use or beauty or simplicity; but while we do thus dress without personal convenience or artistic meaning, we have no true civilization in the matter of our clothes. Modern millinery is neither art nor nature. It is our translation of the primitive man's delight in rare and gaudy colors, and there is no essential difference between the two. What difference there is consists simply in conventional acceptance, but the esthetic base of each is the same.—Cornhill Magazine.

WE SHOULD accustom the mind to keep the best company by introducing it only to the best books.—Sydney Smith.

One of the Wonders of California.

During our pleasant sojourn in Santa Barbara we were invited by an old friend to visit the Old Mission, and from thence to the bounteous production of nature, the "Big Grape-vine," as it is called by every one in its vicinity. A description of the services at the Old Mission would doubtless be of little interest to your numerous readers, so familiar are many of them with the old Spanish customs, but to your correspondent it was a delightful treat. The huge vine spoken of above, and which I was so kindly invited to inspect, is situated in the section known as Montecito, about three miles from the town (or city it professes to be) on the road to what will undoubtedly, in the future, become more extensively known as the remarkable Hot Springs of Santa Barbara. Although this vine, so highly spoken of and eulogized, did not come fully up to the expectations we had realized from the marvelous stories so often told the temporary sojourner, yet enough was learned of its romantic history (planted, as it was, before the year 1800,) and under such peculiar circumstances, by Senorita Dominguez, when but a single shoot (in fact a riding-whip presented by her lover,) to induce the belief that it has but one known rival on this continent.

This vine has now assumed the proportions of a foot in diameter at its base, and its extensive branches require something like sixty trellises to support them. It is inclosed by a high board fence, and under its spreading branches has been built a fine dancing-floor, around the edges of which are rudely-constructed seats. Upon this floor the Spanish fandango is indulged in, while upon the benches, during the summer nights, are congregated the senors and senoritas, intent upon a rehearsal of their sweet love songs, so peculiarly their own. The entrance to the inclosure containing this vinous monstrosity is through a low-roofed dwelling, peculiarly Spanish in its construction; inside this is a bar plentifully stocked with liquors which, with the two bits entrance fee and the quite extensive bar patronage the Dona receives, enables the aged lady to live in comparative affluence. The immense product of this vine we have not heretofore alluded to, so very improbable does it seem that one vine should give in weight the enormous amount of over twelve thousand pounds in one year. Alongside of this, but in a separate inclosure, is another vine of some twelve years' growth, which is said to be fast rivalling the parent stem, both in size and prolificness.—San Francisco Alta.

IN THESE days of "going out of town," the question: "Which is the best burglar alarm?" is one that comes home to almost every man's business and bosom. It would be invidious for us to help the reader to choose among those which are advertised, but we may whisper in his ear that if he can secure a duplicate of one we have just been reading about, he had better do so at once, regardless of expense. This particular burglar alarm is a woman. Respect for her feelings, lest all the men should speak at once, compels us not to divulge her name, though we are not sure but we should divulge it, if we only knew it. Likewise her place of abode, lest the aristocratic and orthodox owners of the accommodation-train that saunters to the town she lives in should be obliged by the increased rush of visitors to stop the Sunday trains. Enough that she is a woman, and that she has a local habitation and a name. She lives in a lonely detached villa, bounded on the north by a roaring prairie, and on the south by a howling wilderness. There is no doctor nearer than down street. On a certain night, when the rain was pattering dismally against the galvanized sheet-iron of the Mansard roof, and the thunder was shouting to the lightning to "come on," and the lightning, quick as a flash, replied, "you bet," this woman was roused from her slumbers by the news that the baby had the croup. It was the baby himself that let her know it. To rush to his crib was the work of a moment. As the poet says: "So light to the crouper the lady she swung;" but what could she do? Her husband was away from home. Whom could she send for the doctor? The nurse, as usual in such cases, had no presence of mind, and might as well have had absence of body. The lady, however, having tried every remedy she could think of, suddenly bethought her of Mrs. Allen's World's Hair Restorer. "This boy is my heir," she cried, "and if he isn't the World's, so much the worse for the World. Mrs. Allen declares this remedy is not a die, yet if it be, the die is cast, and I will use it." She ordered the nurse to bring the bottle from a neighboring closet. "Never say dye, ma'am," ejaculated the trembling menial, weakly fumbling at the closet door. But hardly had she opened it than she shrieked, and, plunging under the bed with "Oh, Lor, ma'am, there's a man in the closet," disappeared from sight. "A man is there," said the lady, and flung the closet door wide open, when, sure enough, a stalwart negro emerged to view. He was so black that, as Thoreau would have said, he was almost white. He looked darkly at the lady, and she looked darkly at the darkey. Did she blench? Did she turn pale? Did the lily displace the rose on her cheek? No, she did none of these things. She just said to the rascal: "Go, right straight away, to Doctor Pillaudeoddlo, and tell him to come and see my baby." And the sable fiend, astonished at finding himself treated like a useful member of society, went and fetched the doctor. As Miss Edgeworth says, whenever she is drawing a particularly long bow: "This is a fact." New York Tribune.

Religious Intelligence.

IT IS estimated that there are at least six thousand Catholic Indians in Washington Territory.

WHILE in London the Czar was waited upon by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York at Buckingham Palace, who presented to him a Bible in Russ, a translation by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

THE English Baptist Missionary Society (like the Church of England and the Wesleyan Missionary Societies) reports the largest income ever received, being over £10,000. Five new missionaries will be sent out this year.

THE priests of Rome and Italy are exceedingly angry because the government of Victor Emanuel insists upon the civil service form for marriage preceding the ecclesiastical. The government has already fined many priests for disobeying the law.

AT THE annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, held last month, the Earl of Shaftesbury presided for the twentieth successive year. The increase of the income last year was over $15,000, the receipts for the year being over $1,000,000.

THE First Congregational church of Marblehead has existed one hundred and ninety years, and during that time has had but ten pastors, or one in every nineteen years. There are no such churches, in these days, outside of the old colony of Massachusetts.

IN ROME two Protestant churches, both of them Episcopalian, are making rapid progress toward completion. The English church in the Piazza di San Silvestro, near the center of the city, will be finished in the course of the summer. St. Paul's church, American Episcopal, is on the Via Nazionale.

THE Italian Bible Society has in preparation an Italian family Bible, and is putting into circulation a large number of tracts. It has lately received from a prominent personage in Germany the large gift of twenty-five thousand francs. The Unita Cattolica, which has a ready scent for foreign interference, declares that the personage in question is Prince Bismarck—which is likely enough.

THE number of ministers in the United States of all denominations is estimated at 65,000. The average salary which these ministers receive is $650. The highest average is in the Methodist Episcopal Church, reaching $700. The highest ministerial salary is that of Mr. Beecher, which is $20,000, and the lowest we heard of is that of a minister who agreed to preach for $50, and his congregation failed to give him that.

THE fifty-fifth Conference of the Primitive Methodist connection was held in London, commencing June 3. The Rev. W. Rowe was chosen chairman. The Conference adopted a petition to the House of Commons praying that the hours for keeping open drinking saloons might not be lengthened. The statistics show 164,660 members—an increase of 4,002. The number of traveling preachers is 1,020; local preachers, 14,838; connectional chapels, 3,826; Sunday schools, 3,536; teachers, 49,887; Sunday school scholars, 306,333. The committee reports the following as the circulation of the monthlies: Large Magazine, 8,000; Christian Messenger, 23,500; Juvenile Magazine, 19,800; Child's Friend, 14,175. The Conference received a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance. The chapel returns show for the year 99 new buildings, having 21,542 sittings, which cost £87,200. The total number of connectional chapels is 3,829, which cost £1,490,800. During the year £42,200 had been paid in debts. On June 7 the Conference held a camp meeting.

A GREAT revolution is taking place in the Established Church of Scotland. The bill before the House of Lords for the abolition of "patronage" is being advocated with considerable earnestness. Its friends have large hopes that it will pass. What is known as "patronage" is the right which certain individuals hold and exercise to place a minister over a vacant church. The holder of this "patronage" can select whom he pleases from among the men licensed by the church courts to preach. But a presbytery cannot ordain a man over a church unless he has been so selected, or, as it is termed, "presented." This "patronage" has been a bone of contention ever since its introduction, which was during the reign of Queen Anne. It has driven off many of the best men from the Established Church into the Free Church of Scotland, and has been the means of putting into the pulpits of the "Established" men who could not, but for this favoritism, secure a pulpit or obtain a hearing. Some of them preach to congregations which do not number over two or three dozen. The new bill contemplates the payment to the patrons of one year's stipend, or ministerial salary, as an equivalent for the "patronage;" the ministers then to be elected by the votes of the male members of each church. One of the hopes of its promoters is that it will bring back to the communion of the "Established" those who have gone over to the "Free." But the Free Church men say that they are free enough as they are; and it is not likely that they will return in great numbers.—Christian at Work.

ROMANISM IN CHINA.—Dr. Newman gives the following items of Roman Catholic progress in China. At Tientsin a chapel and orphanage are in process of erection on the site where the sisters were massacred, and a new cathedral is being built in the foreign concession. At Chefoo and Hangkow their buildings are extensive. At Kiaklang part of their establishment consists of a tea factory, whose outside trade is done by Chinese converts, and the inside by priests. The profits for 1873 were $10,000. At Shanghai they are very large landholders. Six miles outside the city they have an establishment covering many acres, including a church, orphanage, a college for two hundred boys and girls, and an observatory. At Canton they are erecting a cathedral of Hong Kong granite, one hundred feet wide and two hundred and fifty feet long. The site it occupies was once the residence of the Chinese government, but the French army gave it to the church. "From the bishop to the humblest priest, from the lady superior to the least sister of charity, all wear the costume of Chinese. In the garb of traders they penetrate into the interior, and are to-day where no Protestant missionary has ever been. They mingle freely with the boat population on the Min at Foochow, and on the Pearl river at Canton. They do not preach; they teach. The catechism is offered to the people instead of the Bible. They are elastic and accommodating. The transition from paganism to Catholicism is made easy by an exchange of forms and ceremonies. The crucifix and rosary are toys in the hands of the natives. The ancestral worship of the Chinese has its counterpart in the worship of saints practiced by the papists. Money is the most effective grace in multiplying converts."

JUBILEE OF THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The American Sunday School Union celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in the Academy of Music, at Philadelphia, on Tuesday evening, the twenty-sixth ultimo, in the presence of an immense audience. Hon. George H. Stuart presided and made an address. He was followed by Rev. Drs. John Hall and Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., of New York, and Rev. John Peddie. A meeting was held at the Broadway Tabernacle, in New York, on the following Thursday evening, at which Mr. Stuart also presided. The following is a summary of the fifty years' work: For seven years (from 1839 to 1845 inclusive) a complete statistical record is not now to be found. For the remaining period (forty-three years,) terminating March 1, 1874, we report: Schools organized, 57,799; containing teachers, 386,912; containing scholars, 2,542,787. Estimating the seven years at an average of 500 schools per annum, with 6 teachers and 30 scholars to each, which is far below the average of the preceding and following years, the total result for fifty years would be: Schools organized, 61,299; containing teachers, 401,242; containing scholars, 2,650,717. In addition to the Sunday schools actually organized, there has been another and equally important work, to wit: to nurture and sustain those and other schools. The records show that by visits and words of counsel and encouragement, and gifts of books, papers, etc., assistance has been extended to 87,291 cases, representing a membership of teachers 674,959 and of scholars 4,842,768. Amount expended in missionary operations (1824-74) $2,133,264.13, of which about $317,000 were for books, papers, etc., granted to needy Sunday schools. Value of books, papers, etc., circulated by sale and grants (1824-74,) over $6,000,000. Addresses were made by Mr. Stuart, the chairman, and Revs. Stephen Paxson, M. B. Lewis, F. G. Ensign, John McCullagh and Rev. B. W. Childlaw, some of the veterans in the missionary service of the board. Rev. Dr. Ormiston made a response in behalf of the city of New York. The choir of the Tabernacle church added to the interest of the occasion by selections of music. A very large assembly was in attendance.

THE Church Missionary Intelligencer, says the Independent, gives reports from the missionaries of that society at Nagasaki and at Osaka. At Nagasaki, the only Japanese port formerly open to foreigners, the selfish and unchristian policy of the Dutch bids fair to be a strong obstacle to the spread of the gospel, as it has been elsewhere in the East, especially in the Indian Archipelago. The missionaries bear testimony to the intense readiness of the Japanese to accept European science and customs and the English language, a readiness which has not yet, however, extended to the reception of the gospel, in regard to which there is much suspicion on the part both of officials and of the people—so much that the missionary at Nagasaki could persuade no landlord to rent him a house for a preaching station. While the edicts against Christianity have been removed from sight, they have by no means been abrogated. The restrictions as to residence have not yet been removed, and, although a more liberal policy prevails toward converts, the fear of persecution has not yet ceased. One convert at Nagasaki had opportunity, through a long and painful imprisonment, to bear steadfast testimony to his faith; and another man imposed himself upon the missionary, as was afterward found, in order to obtain money from the department of religion, by betraying those whom he might meet at the missionary's house. One of the most interesting visits as yet paid by the latter was made to a large Buddhist temple. On asking for admission he was politely told that only priests were allowed to enter the sacred inclosure. "Be it so," he replied; "but I am myself a priest—the English priest of Oura" (the name of the foreign settlement.) Upon this he was admitted, and, having taken off his boots and hat, was led into the temple by about twenty priests. "Inside I beheld, as I expected, the idol, altar, incense, flowers, and all the other paraphernalia of heathen worship. My heart grew hot within me. I felt that I must speak, and so for the space of three-quarters of an hour; and in the very presence of this idol I was enabled, by God's grace, to preach to the poor fellows of the Lord Jesus and of the hollowness of idolatry. They were very attentive, indeed, to my words. They confessed that very much of what I said was true, told me that I was a learned man, and some of them expressed a wish to come and see me, that they might hear more of Christ." Several afterward called upon him, and one of them purchased a Bible. The report closes with an allusion to the work of grace going on among the sailors of the royal navy. The missionary knows of only one ship in the Japanese squadron on which there are no Christian sailors, and on one he is acquainted with no less than twenty God-fearing men. Besides, there is in all of them a band of total abstainers.

Wandering Stars.

The comet now so conspicuous in the heavens attracts universal attention. It is becoming more luminous from night to night, but will soon disappear below our horizon. The awe and terror which these anomalous objects once inspired have passed away with the advance of science, and we can welcome their visits within the limits of our planetary system, gaze upon their marvelous beauty, and study their phenomena without apprehension of danger. The fear which they once inspired was doubtless the product of ignorance and superstition. It may have often happened that pestilence, war and other calamities were coincident with their appearance. Then their structure and movements were so mysterious, and for a long time so perplexing even to the astronomer, that it is not strange that they were popularly regarded as miraculous apparitions to warn a wicked world, and to bear to our sphere a horrible freightage of woe. Besides, comets have a very suspicious habit of crossing the orbits of the planets, and of sometimes putting themselves in the very track of the ball on which we live. Biela's comet, in 1832, created no little excitement and alarm in consequence of the prediction that it would cross the path of the earth. It did, but the earth chanced to be millions of miles away from the point of intersection.

For our greater assurance it has been pretty well ascertained that the cometary matter is a gaseous substance, a mere vapor so exceedingly attenuated that no harm would be done if it were to come in contact with our globe. If we may credit Kepler's statement that "there are more comets in the heavens than fish in the ocean," we may also believe that some great and beneficent end is subserved by them. Tyndall conjectures that they, and asteroids and meteors also, contribute fuel to the sun, and thus help to feed that enormous combustion on which our comfort and life depend. Certain it is that comets in their perihelion passage are sometimes alarmingly near the sun, and the accelerated motion detected in Encke's comet indicates that it approaches the sun still nearer at each return, and that it may ultimately plunge into the surging sea of fire. And then, alas for us! this same tendency may be true of all the planetary bodies, and our own earth may, like a chip thrown into a bonfire, add its mite to the great central luminary. But as this problematical event is not likely to happen for many millions of years, we shall not be here or there to see, and our readers will scarcely concern themselves about it.

Seneca, the Roman philosopher, a cotemporary of the Apostle Paul, is said to have entertained the opinion that these erratic bodies would some day fall within the domain of human knowledge, that their orbits would be traced, and that they would be found to be permanent members of the solar system. And so it has come to pass. Newton and Halley were able to demonstrate that the law of gravitation applies with exactness to the orbital movements of these strange bodies. Halley, after a long and laborious computation, announced that the comet bearing his name would return to our system in seventy-five years. Sure enough it came to time, or nearly so. Halley's comet performs its wondrous journey in about seventy-six years, and is as regular in its orbital revolutions as any of the planets. The comets may be wandering stars, but there is method and regularity in their seeming madness. In 1835, the second time since its discovery by Halley, this comet appeared. Those who live to pass the first decade of the twentieth century will doubtless welcome its third visit since it occupied the attention of its discoverer in 1682.

These comets are great travelers. The orbit of Halley's is measured by thousands of millions of miles, and there are doubtless others whose exceedingly elongated ellipses are accomplished only by many centuries of inconceivably rapid motion. At one time they are so near the solar blaze as to encounter a temperature forty-seven thousand times greater than the heat of the sun as received at the earth—a degree of heat more than sufficient to dissipate the most solid substances into invisible gas—and at another time, as in the case of Halley's comet, they pass even the boundary of Neptune, more than three hundred millions of miles. To quote the words of Mitchel: "Some revolve in orbits of moderate eccentricity, while others sweep away into space in parabolic or even in hyperbolic orbits, never again to revisit our system unless arrested and diverted from their path by some disturbing power. The mighty depths to which some of these bodies penetrate into space, sweeping, as they must, vastly beyond the boundary of the planetary system, would excite a doubt in the mind as to whether there might be room enough in space for the undisturbed revolution of these wonderful objects." The size of some of the comets is also something almost incredible. The tail of the great comet of 1680, as computed by Sir Isaac Newton, was one hundred and forty millions of miles long. This is linked brightness long drawn out, and a spread of glowing particles which bewilders. But in the depths there is ample room for such inconceivably vast expansions. These monsters, and perhaps millions more of even greater bulk, find room in which to perform their stupendous evolutions without jostle or collision with any of the other members of the solar or sidereal families.

The comet which has come within our view this summer may not be seen again by any who are now born; possibly it may be back in time to look upon the millennial reign, or likely enough only in time to add to the sublime and terrible grandeur of the final parousia of the Son of Man. This may be its first and its last visit to our system—the first and the last time that mortal man shall gaze upon its train of beauty, as it sweeps with silent majesty across our sky. Its pathway approaches the infinite, and its attenuated but brilliant substance gives it the semblance of some deathless spirit which has all space for its home and eternity for its being. We almost envy its prodigious freedom, as it sails through the boundless ether, touches upon the shores of other worlds, penetrates the mystery of our sun, and traverses the provinces of other and distant systems. The glorified man may have such liberty as this, and the comet's message, besides enlarging and quickening our reverence for the Creator, may be to tell us something of the glorious liberty of the children of God.

At the same time the only probable scriptural allusion to comets is to impress a somewhat different lesson. "Wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." Popularly this answered the purpose of Jude, who would expose those unbelieving believers, those filthy dreamers in the church, those twice dead apostates, and those unstable and false teachers and professors who were to be contrasted with the more orderly planets and the beneficent fixed stars in the Christian community. The comet's temporary brilliance, its momentary revel in the very heart of the sun, and then its returnless plunge into the cold, dark depths, are awfully significant. The inspired reference is graphic enough, and while our readers wonder, enjoy and study our present celestial visitant, they will not lose sight of the application.

WE HAVE not doubted from the beginning that the report on fraternity of our General Conference would be abundantly vindicated by the temper and utterances of the Northern Church. With reference to these Dr. Summers, in the Nashville Christian Advocate, says:

Several Northern Advocates and writers have condemned the "taste" of our General Conference in making a historical resume of the matter of fraternal relations and its connected questions. Doubtless they now see and approve the judgment that dictated our course. Thus did we prepare beforehand for the settlement of questions that were likely to arise, and that have risen sooner than we expected. Northern Methodists and the world at large have been thus informed of historical facts that underlie the whole business—facts of which they were before ignorant—facts that justify our position. What the Plan of Separation is, and what it is worth to us, all may determine. And we must give it all up for formal fraternity! Much as we have desired fraternity, we are not willing to pay that price for it. The "resuscitation" of that plan, or "any recognition of its binding force," is declared to be a thing not consistent with fraternity! Indeed it is not dead or buried—its "binding force" was acknowledged last month in east Tennessee, where a piece of church property was recovered by us in the courts; and more property of the same sort is to be got back in the same way, under that plan. But shall the two Methodisms, while seeking and even professing fraternity, go on in this style, suing and being sued?

We prefer commissioners empowered to settle all such matters in a friendly and brotherly way. We have proposed it. Will our Northern Methodist brethren accept it? Here we stand.

Death by Lightning.

We find the following in the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist concerning the death of Rev. Richard S. Shreve and wife, of the Baltimore Conference. Rev. S. H. Creushaw writes:

You have doubtless heard, through the secular press, of the death, by lightning, of our beloved brother and fellow-laborer, Rev. Richard S. Shreve and his estimable wife. This sad and mournful event occurred in the parsonage of Upper Betetourt circuit, on Thursday evening, June 25, 1874. The startling intelligence reached us by telegraph on Friday. As you may well imagine, it cast a deep gloom over this entire community. Bro. Shrevo was born and reared in this vicinity. He has here a large circle of relatives and connections, and a much larger circle of friends. His grandfather, parents, brothers and sisters are all members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at this place. He was the oldest child of William and Mary Shreve, of Fairfax county, Virginia. He had entered his thirty-sixth year. He was consecrated to God in early youth, and grew up in the church. He enjoyed the rites and privileges of the church, and also the benefits of pious example and religious instruction at home. He was educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, graduating with the class of 1860, together with Bros. P. H. Whisner, B. F. Ball and J. Lester Shipley, of our Conference.

From the address of Rev. B. F. Ball we take the following account of the circumstances:

This, to us, sad occurrence took place about seven o'clock P. M. on Thursday last. On the morning of that day Richard Shreve and his wife, together with the Rev. John Shreve, Jr., preacher of the Pineastle circuit, then on a visit to his brother, spent the day with the family of one of the members of the church. Returning to the parsonage, they found the evening meal prepared, and, as was their wont before partaking of it, they were about to engage in family worship. The husband is seated facing the window, the wife to his right and the brother to the left, on opposite sides of the window, a girl in their employ occupies a seat on the opposite side of the room, the table being between her and them. They see the approaching storm cloud, note the first few drops of rain, earnest of the coming shower, little dreaming that hidden in that dark cloud was that which was speedily to be the messenger of death to two of their number. The first discharge of electricity was upon the dwelling. All over that end of the dwelling in which they were seated, from the comb of the roof to the foundation-stones, as if made by a bursting bomb, were traces of the lightning's work. One current entered just opposite the wife, striking her on the back of the head near the right ear, singeing the hair and scorching the side face and neck. Through two small, clear-cut holes the size of a buck-shot, in the window pane, passed another current that struck the husband upon the neck, photographing the scenery in front of the house upon his breast.

A splintered door, just behind the brother, told how near to him the deadly current passed. There are three children, aged respectively seven, three and one years, in an adjoining room, whither they had gone at their mother's request; hearing the frightful noise they rush into the room. They see their mother prostrate on the floor, her head propped against the wall; their father with his head thrown back upon the table, in the act of falling to the floor; their uncle staggering, and falling about the room, muttering incoherent expressions; the hired girl clinging to the safe for support. The little girl of seven notes every particular—sees the movement of her father's arm, feels the beating of his heart, discovers that he is breathing; "Knows," she says, "that her mamma is dead, but is not certain about her papa;" notes that "Uncle's eyes are closed, but that papa's and mamma's are open."

The hired girl, recovering, with difficulty persuaded the child to leave her little sister and baby-brother, and go with her to summon assistance. The nearest neighbor is a half mile distant, the house not in sight. To this the girl, with the child of seven for a guide, hastens through the rain, and the family are shocked by hearing her exclaim: "My dear papa and mamma are killed by lightning." Just as you and I were shocked when, flashing over the wire, or spoken by trembling lips, the message came to us: "Richard Shrevo and wife are both killed by lightning."

The neighbors, hurrying to the scene, found three apparently lifeless forms prostrate on the floor, and the second child, a little girl, lying upon her mother's arm, close to her breast. They quickly removed the bodies to the yard, exposing them to the falling rain.

John Shreve soon showed signs of returning animation, and by morning was rational and able to move about. He will doubtless fully recover. But it was apparent that no human aid could avail with the others. The subtle current had too surely done its work. Thus instantaneously passed away, without a pang, the husband and wife, for the brother, who survived, had no knowledge of even the lightning's flash.

The worship they had begun is suddenly interrupted. The interruption is doubtless brief—begun on earth, it is continued in heaven.

The Proposed Liquor Law.

MR. EDITOR: The new liquor law proposed by the General Conference to the Annual Conferences does two things:

1. It repeals the law against "drunkenness, or drinking spirituous liquors, unless in cases of necessity." The report adopted by the General Conference orders this law to be stricken out. So if we accept the new, we bid farewell to the old.

2. The proposed law declares and enacts the making, buying, selling and using intoxicating liquors lawful. True, it does not positively declare and enact the making, buying, selling and using to be right and lawful, but by implication it so declares and enacts. The explanatory clause, "as a beverage," is qualifying and restrictive—restricts the law to cases where liquor is made, bought, sold or used as a beverage—and by implication makes it lawful for church members to make, buy, sell or use in any other way.

To convict under this proposed law it will be necessary to prove that the accused member makes, buys, sells or uses intoxicating liquors, and further that he makes, buys, sells or uses these liquors as a beverage. The onus probandi is here on the accuser. Under the existing law "drunkenness or drinking spirituous liquors" is forbidden. There is, however, an exception in the law against drinking as to cases of necessity. Here the drinking must be proven by the accuser, and the exception or necessity by the accused. But as the proposed law legalizes the making, buying, selling or using, and forbids only the beverage, of course the whole onus probandi will be thrown on the accuser. It may be easy to prove that a distiller makes quantities of liquor or even liquors, and yet difficult to prove that he makes one drop as a beverage. It may be easy to prove that a man buys, sells or uses, but difficult to prove that he buys, sells or uses one drop as a beverage. A wholesale grocer fills the order of a planter for a barrel of whisky; how will you prove that he sells that barrel of whisky as a barrel of beverages? A commission merchant or factor buys and ships to a patron a barrel of Bourbon; how will you prove that he buys and sells it as a beverage? How will you prove that he sells it as a beverage, when in fact he has no knowledge of the use to which it is to be applied? The effect of passing this law will be to repeal a law easily understood, and to place among the General Rules a law of doubtful meaning, which on this account will be wholly inoperative. If the church wishes to forbid the making, buying, selling and using of liquor, but to make an exception in cases of mechanical, chemical and medicinal uses, let a law be so framed; but let us not have this bungling, meaningless law transferred from "the constitution and by-laws of the Sons of Temperance;" and, by the by, I would greatly prefer that our General Rules should be taken from the Scriptures rather than from the aforesaid "constitution and by-laws." But times have changed. Romanism gets her laws from the fathers, Episcopalianism from the fathers, and now Southern Methodism is proposing to draw a little from the "constitution and by-laws," backed up by "an overwhelming sentiment which is sweeping over the country." Indeed a "grand worthy chief templar" of the "Independent Order of Good Templars" used this language before the General Conference: "Now the General Conference found itself face to face with an overwhelming sentiment which is sweeping over the country on the subject of temperance." These overwhelming sentiments sweeping over the country are to be incorporated into the laws of the church, and the church must adapt her legislation to temperance societies and women's temperance crusades. The church once adapted her legislation to the overwhelming abolition sentiment which swept over the country, and what was the result? And now it is proposed that at the sacrifice of fifty thousand members she shall adapt herself to another overwhelming sentiment. About the time of the next General Conference she may be called on to adapt herself to another overwhelming sentiment on the question of tobacco, and to enact a law against "making, buying, selling or using it as a beverage." The fifth article of religion expresses the true basis of the church: "The holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." Strange that in the discussion of this proposed law in the General Conference not a single reference was made to the Scriptures, nor a single argument drawn from them. The proposed law is a transfer from the "constitution and by-laws," and the arguments were drawn from the demands of the time and sentiment of the country. S.

The Southern University.

To the Bishop and Members of the Alabama Conference:

The commencement exercises of the fifteenth session of the Southern University began on Sunday, the twenty eighth day of June last, with a sermon before the graduating class by Bishop E. M. Marvin, from Hebrews xii, 14 to 17; Hebrews xi, 24 to 26; Galatians v, 24 and 25. The sermon was a graphic and impressive description of the great conflict between the fleshly and spiritual consciousness and powers of man for ascendency, and the necessity of the subjugation of his entire carnal nature to his spiritual nature. It was a dignified but earnest and severe rebuke to sensualism not only in its grosser forms, but also in its modified and more moderate phases of sinful pleasures and worldly-mindedness. In matter, style and illustration the sermon was a full success even for the Bishop, and was regarded by the large and intelligent audience as a complete, masterly vindication of the doctrine of holiness, and the necessity of the "crucifixion of the flesh, with the affections and lusts."

On Tuesday, the thirtieth, Prof. H. D. Moore, of the Alabama Female College, delivered the address before the Belles-Lettres and Clariosophic Societies. The address was practical and forcible, full of good sense, wit and genuine philosophy of thought, delivered with ease, and received with evident favor by the entire assembly. The speech of Prof. T. O. Summers before the alumni, delivered immediately afterwards, was brilliant and eloquent, both in thought and style, and was pronounced with graceful animation.

The orations of the representatives of the Belles-Lettres and Clariosophic Societies and of the graduating class were highly creditable to all the speakers. All the best styles of composition—the witty, the metaphysical, the ornate, the pathetic and the patriotic—were represented, and the elocution was in every speech well adapted to the subject and the occasion. The orations of the graduating class indicated a high degree of culture and training in thought, expression and declamation, alike creditable to the students and the university.

S. M. Hosmer and C. H. Kelley, of Alabama, graduated in moral philosophy, and degrees were conferred on twelve other young men, as follows: Bachelor of philosophy, A. H. Moore and M. N. Morris, of Alabama; bachelor of arts, J. O. Keener, Louisiana, and W. B. Murrah, Mississippi; master of arts, J. M. Crews, A. Lawson and T. D. Mitchell, Alabama; bachelor of divinity, Frank M. Peterson, Alabama; doctor of medicine, A. Lawson and J. P. Borden, Alabama, C. L. Hoyle, North Carolina, and T. Y. Nelson, Mississippi. The honorary degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on Rev. T. M. Finney, of St. Louis.

The exercises closed with an appropriate, forcible baccalaureate by the president on "Integrity." The importance and fitness of the theme and the seriousness of the occasion must have commended his wise counsel to the young men to whom it was specially addressed.

Thus much, we think, is sufficient as to the commencement exercises of the Southern University. It was an occasion of interest to all present, particularly to visitors, to whom much courtesy and kindness were manifested by the intelligent, refined and hospitable people of Greensboro.

There are some special, prominent facts and features connected with the university to which we invite the attention of the Conference and of its patrons and of the public.

1. The high grade of scholarship necessary for graduation or the reception of a degree.

The course of study is thorough and well selected. The professorships are not only ably filled, but by men who are "apt to teach," and full of energy and ambition in their respective departments. Lectures, recitations and written exercises, text-books and books of reference, experimental illustrations and critical examinations, are all afforded and utilized daily for the advancement of the student. But as his facilities and aids for learning are increased, so is his progress expected and required to be fully satisfactory if he apply for graduation. It is not sufficient that he shall have completed the course of study by an average show of attainment; he must by examination, daily, semi-annual and final, be declared distinguished. The result of such thorough tuition, and rigid, critical examination and requirement is that the students, as a general rule, are industrious and ambitious, and the graduates scholarly and learned. A degree from the Southern University means progress, proficiency, distinction.

2. The large number of young ministers and sons of ministers as compared with the entire number of students. There were one hundred and seventeen matriculates for the year 1873-4, of whom twenty-three were ministers and twelve others the sons of ministers. This fact is highly commendatory of the influence of our ministry upon their own households, and serves as a full refutation of the charge that "ministers' sons are worse than other people's."

Besides this significant fact, this large proportion of young ministers has a very beneficial influence upon the moral and religious interests of the university. College life, with its temptations and wicked associations, has always been a terror to parents and a severe ordeal to the stability of purpose and moral courage of the student. How fortunate for the youth of our church and country that we have an institution of learning where there is such a strong sentiment in favor of religion, and at which our sons may mix and associate on intimate terms with a large class of intelligent young men who are consecrated to the ministry of God's word. Such association is the best safeguard against profligacy and dissipation, and patrons of the university may reasonably, hopefully expect that the power of such daily communication will lead their sons into the paths of righteousness and peace. It is this influence, to a great degree, that has established the good order and obedience to authority so characteristic of the students at Greensboro, and has contributed so largely to the consideration of some of the best talent ever sent to or developed at the university.

3. The financial condition of the university is not good. It is in debt to its professors, in small sums, in deficits in payment of salaries, and to others for money borrowed to supplement its meager collections from generous subscribers, who have been prevented from paying by the pressure of the times. There are thirty-five beneficiaries who pay no tuition, and some others who are partially delinquent in this respect. The payment of interest on the indebtedness thus existing and of the salaries of the professors, and the annual contingent expenditures for repairs, replenishing, etc., with so small an income from tuition fees and interest paying notes, has brought and keeps the university in debt. A few generous men of Greensboro, during the commencement, paid up a portion of this amount, which is a good start in the right direction. The trustees have made arrangements for the opening of the university on the first Wednesday in October next.

Prof. T. O. Summers has vacated his chair to accept a professorship in the Vanderbilt University. Arrangements have been made to procure a worthy successor to this dutiful and learned teacher, who is an alumnus of our university. The faculty of the university has been diligent and devoted to duty, evincing, amid their financial embarrassments, a spirit of self-sacrifice worthy of the praise and remembrance of the church.

If this monetary trouble continue much longer, the faculty, trustees and friends of the institution will become discouraged, and the resources of the university—its moneyed assets, buildings and apparatus—together with its hopes and gracious influences, may be lost to the church and to the cause of education.

As the best and most practical method of preventing such a calamity, let the Methodists of Alabama and our patronizing Conferences rally to the support and relief of the only university we have under our control.

We appeal to you for patronage and donation. Our denomination is the largest in the State, and we educate more young men than any other church. We do not ask you to abandon your local schools, but, urging you to sustain these well, we do insist that you shall send your sons who desire a collegiate or professional education, to the Southern University. Its faculty, its curriculum, its facilities for education and its alumni compare favorably with those of any university in the South, while its advantages and influences for moral development are unsurpassed anywhere.

And we should not only send our sons to the university, but should give freely of our means. What nobler charity, what greater and more fruitful benefaction, what more blessed investment, than to aid the pious and gifted young men of our church in their struggles for preparation to preach the gospel of the Son of God.

The university has had some patronage, during the last year, from its friends in Mississippi, Arkansas, west Tennessee, Georgia and Florida, which we hope will be continued during the future.

We suggest that some special action be taken at our next annual session to induce the North Alabama Conference to become more closely and largely interested with us in the patronage and management of the university. She is our sister by nature and in affection, bound to us and we to her, by ties of friendship and love that mere difference of name and imaginary or geographical lines cannot sever, and our children should be taught to cultivate and perpetuate this feeling of State and Church pride, and loyalty to each other. One of the best means of nurturing this sentiment is to educate our young men at our own Southern University, where, by intimate association and under the fostering care of men of sanctified learning, they may learn to love each other, our own institutions and the church of our choice.

The interests which we have, as citizens, brethren and philanthropists, in the destiny of the university afford a sufficient apology for the length of this report.

A. J. BRIGGS,
LEVI W. REEVES,
Vis. Committee.

WE HAVE RECEIVED, too late for insertion in this number, a short communication from Bishop Keener giving account of the commencement of Centenary. Bishop Keener reports that everything came off well. The sermon by Bishop Marvin was every thing that could be desired, the literary address by Dr. Tudor first-rate, the baccalaureate by President Andrews excellent, and the speeches of the graduates good. The attendance on Wednesday (commencement day) was never excelled even in ante-bellum times.

THE admiration bestowed on former times is the bias of all times; the golden age never was the present age.—Howe.

Our camp meeting—the Seashore camp meeting—our camp meeting near Biloxi—the camp meeting by the sea, where the waves break and where the salubrious breezes blow—begins on Friday morning, the twenty-fourth instant. Preachers and people from far and near are invited to attend. Read the very careful and explicit directions in the communication of the trustees, and be governed thereby. Bring along your hymn and tune-books, hymn-books, and all the other appliances of song; and come in good tune of soul, filled with the Spirit, and praying with all prayer. The trustees have wrought long and hard to have everything in readiness and as comfortable as possible. They will be on the ground to supervise the order and general arrangements of the occasion, and will do their best to make the meeting a pleasant and profitable one. Besides the rank and file, Bishops Marvin and Keener will be on hand to assist in the services.

On our second page will be found a discourse delivered on the occasion of the funeral of Hon. W. L. Sharkey, by Rev. C. B. Galloway. The copy reached this office during our absence in May, and has been overlooked until now. Judge Sharkey was an eminent jurist, a good citizen and a Christian. He was great, good and distinguished, and his memory will be respected and honored for generations to come.

Seashore Camp Ground.

The annual camp-meeting on the Seashore camp ground, two miles west of Biloxi, Mississippi, will commence on Friday, the twenty-fourth of July, and continue beyond the second Sabbath.

Great improvements have been made on the grounds since the encampment of last year. The number of private tents has been more than doubled, and several additional public tents have been erected.

A number of plain but comfortable wooden tents, with good floor and roof, are being put up for rent to individuals or families desiring to hire, some 12 feet by 13, at $10, others 12 feet by 25, at $15, for the period of the camp meeting.

Persons desiring to erect cloth or other temporary tents will have comfortable positions assigned them on application to any member of the board of trustees.

Gentlemen of experience in the business have been placed in charge of the boarding department, who will furnish good and satisfactory board on the terms of last year, to wit: Fifty cents for breakfast and supper each, and seventy-five cents for dinner, or $1.50 per day.

Lodging accommodations are provided for at fifty cents per night.

The trustees have made arrangements with the railroads for conveyance of passengers at reduced prices. By the New Orleans and Mobile railroad, from New Orleans for $3.25 and from Mobile for $2.50 for the trip, and proportionate prices from all the way stations; by the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern railroad and by the Mobile and Montgomery railroad at half the usual price of regular fare.

These roads will issue a special camp meeting ticket, with return coupon, which will require to be stamped at the office of the secretary on the camp ground in order to be good to return on.

The Mobile and Ohio railroad will sell tickets from any point south of Meridian to Mobile at three cents per mile. At Mobile parties will get the regular camp meeting ticket.

In this city tickets can be had at the ticket office, corner of Camp and Common streets, and at the depot, at the head of Canal street; and at the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, and at all the way stations on the roads.

Passenger trains will leave the depot, at head of Canal street, New Orleans, daily, at 8 A. M., 3.15 P. M. and 4 P. M.; and depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 8 A. M. and 5 P. M., all stopping at all way stations, including camp meeting station, except the 4 P. M. train from New Orleans, which will stop at the principal stations only, except on Saturdays, when it also will stop at camp meeting station.

Freight trains leave the depot, corner of Levee and Girod streets, New Orleans, at 8.25 A. M.; and the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 9.30 A. M. daily, and take freight to or from the camp meeting at half the usual prices.

Persons desiring to attend the camp meeting are recommended to make arrangements for their comfort before the date of the camp meeting by application to any member of the board of trustees.

Our Missionary.

I am truly glad that our missionary secretaries have started this enterprise. It is what the church has long needed greatly. And now that there are some symptoms of life about our missionary movements, let all lovers of the church and souls lend a hand.

Our Missionary ought to have seventy-five thousand subscribers, and will have if the ministers do their duty. I hope Alabama will not be behind. Let the preachers of this district bring it before all their people. Any one can raise twenty cents—the price where ten names are sent together. And as it will be some weeks before I shall be able to see all the pastors on the district, I take this opportunity to urge upon them to preach in all their congregations on the subject of missions. You cannot do a better service for the church or yourselves. "Go or Send" and "Go or Die" will help you to thoughts and arguments. J. Hamilton.

Whitworth Female College, Brookhaven, Mississippi, Rev. H. F. Johnson, president, is known throughout the South as one of our best and most prosperous Methodist institutions. Look at the picture and read the advertisement in another column.

Clarksville Female Academy

Clarksville, Tenn.—This is one of the oldest institutions in the land. It has had a successful career and has been very popular. Last year it passed into the hands of Rev. J. M. Wright, who is thoroughly renovating the building and furnishing it anew. For the next session he has secured the services of ten elegant and highly accomplished ladies to assist him in the various departments.

In the literary department he will establish a normal class, embracing the teachers in that department and any others who may desire to join it. This is an admirable feature in this school. Young ladies who have graduated and desire to become teachers will have the opportunity of training for that delicate and responsible vocation.

Miss Carnes, one of the most accomplished teachers in the land, presides in the department of drawing and painting, and her department has been a decided success. Her art levee at the last commencement exhibited more than two hundred and fifty pictures as the result of ten months' work. She and her work have been universally commended. We do not think that she has a superior in the whole land.

The music department is furnished with twelve good instruments—all good, some superior. Two fine pianists will preside in this department, one of them a very fine vocalist, and special attention will be given to vocal culture.

The boarding department will be under the special supervision of the president and his lady. So far as they know they have given entire satisfaction heretofore. The academy is a pleasant home to the daughters intrusted to their charge.

Alpha.

Centenary College.—The advertisement of this noble institution speaks for itself. Take a look at the cut, which, however, gives but an imperfect idea of that grand expanse—seven hundred feet front. In photographing for the engraving the camera took in but little over half of each wing, and yet the breadth of perspective in the picture, being nearly five hundred feet, prevents the eye from appreciating at first the grand altitude of the center building. See the advertisement. Note especially the class of men composing the board of trustees.

Garden Seeds.—Those in quest of garden seeds for fall gardens should read the advertisement of Mr. Richard Frotscher, No. 12 Dumaine street, near the French Market, who keeps the celebrated seeds of Buist.

Levy Bros., No. 580 Magazine street, have beautiful goods, adapted to the hot days or cool evenings, and those who are now preparing for the autumn may do well to consult their prices and qualities of goods.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

The next term of this venerable institution opens on the first Monday in October, 1874.

Faculty.—Rev. C. G. Andrews, A. M., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Political Economy and International Law; Rev. A. R. Holcombe, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Adjunct Professor of Natural Science; G. H. Wiley, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages; T. S. Jones, M. D., Professor of Natural Science; Rev. R. D. Norsworthy, A. M., Principal of the Preparatory Department.

Charges.—Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in College, $60; Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in Preparatory Department, $40; Contingent expenses, $5. A matriculation fee of $5 must be paid on entering any regular college class. One-half the charges must be paid when the student enters; the other half on the beginning of the second term, March 1.

Board.—Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be had in the best families for $20 per month. Day-boarding with the same families, $18 per month. Rooms provided in the dormitories free of rent. Board to be paid in advance at least one month.

Location.—This institution is located in the lovely village of Jackson, about twelve miles from Bayou Sara, in a grove of pine, magnolia, oak and beech. The location is remarkable for its beautiful woodlands, its bland and delightful atmosphere, its pure water, its unrivaled healthfulness, and its cultivated and refined society.

When Founded.—The college was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and ceded to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845.

Alumni.—Its Alumni numbers two hundred and three, and they are to be found in the most honorable and useful stations in the land.

Apparatus and Cabinet.—The college possesses a valuable set of Philosophical, Astronomical and Chemical Apparatus, and also a well-selected Mineralogical and Geological Cabinet. The apparatus includes a Theodolite, Sextant, Compass, Chronometer, Atwood's Machine, Whirling Tables, Electrical Machine, Air Pump, various combinations of the Mechanical Powers, Batteries, Chemical Tests, etc., sufficient for a thorough and extended course of observations and experiments. Steps have been taken by the Board of Trustees to put these in thorough repair.

Literary Societies.—There are two regular Literary Societies connected with the institution. These are of great utility to young men acquiring a liberal education—improving them in the art of public speaking, making them in some degree familiar with the proceedings of deliberative bodies, and in cultivating systematic business habits. Each Society has a convenient hall and a well-selected Library—about one thousand six hundred volumes each, which, added to the College Library of two thousand volumes, makes over five thousand volumes in the college.

Buildings.—The Trustees are determined to continue the repairs on the buildings till completed. The grand Center Building is a noble specimen of architectural beauty and adaptation to the purposes of its erection. The wings, built of solid brick, present each a front of two hundred feet, with upper and lower galleries the entire length, supported by Tuscan columns, and with the center making in the perspective a continuous front of seven hundred feet.

Preparatory Department.—In the Preparatory Department students are fitted for regular college classes, or may obtain a thorough English or commercial education.

The Faculty.—Its Faculty are men of experience and success in teaching.

Over the Pennsylvania Railroad by Daylight.—Probably the best specimen of an American highway to be found anywhere is the Pennsylvania railroad between Pittsburg and New York. In solidity of construction, superiority of bridge architecture and smoothness of track it is unrivaled. Throughout its entire length it is laid with a double track of steel rail, weighing sixty-seven pounds to the yard. The rolling stock is as near perfection as human ingenuity can make it, combining the highest excellence attainable. On the first of June commenced running the fast train from Pittsburg to New York, with close connections at Harrisburg for Baltimore and Washington. The magnificent run of four hundred and forty-four miles between Pittsburg and New York is made with but three stoppages. The train is made up of Pullman parlor cars and the company's best day coaches, all splendidly upholstered, mounted on combination springs, and furnished with plate glass, through which the landscape can be distinctly seen. The scenery on this line is beautiful, and in many places grand. The attractions of the Alleghany mountains need no comment. The long sweeps of wooded hills, lofty mountains and dark ravines, picturesque valleys opening into each other, sparkling and placid waters, and wide-rolling pastoral landscapes fall in rapid succession. After having breakfasted in the Mississippi valley and dined at the capital of Pennsylvania, the passenger finds himself seated at the supper-table in the metropolis of New York.

Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York.—Among the varied attractions offered to visitors to the great city of New York there is nothing which strikes the stranger with more pleasant surprise, and we may say amazement, than the wonder of her hotels. Such are not to be found in any other part of the world. Not only the splendor and vastness of the buildings and costliness of the furniture and equipments, which surpass in their luxuriousness the palaces of the kings, but the almost endless variety of viands, of every domestic production and imported from all parts of the globe, make up bills of fare equal to the demands of the most capricious appetites, and at the same time afford food for reflection upon the skill, enterprise and indomitable energy of those men and companies who erect and conduct them. Messrs. Darling, Griswold & Co., proprietors of the Fifth Avenue, located at 194 Fifth avenue, are in the front rank of such enterprise. Their house is supplied with all the modern improvements and conveniences, and it seems to us that nothing is wanting that a guest could desire.

E. E. F. Ross, Esq., connected for several years with the Christian Advocate, left on the evening of June 17 to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

We have had for several months in constant use the Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, and it has given such satisfaction to the guests of our house that our orders for it have been larger than for all other kinds of sauce combined.

Clarksville Female Academy,
Clarksville, Tenn.

The next session begins August 31. A full corps of experienced teachers, every department well furnished, ample grounds, excellent boarding arrangements and thorough training give us many advantages.

Clarksville is remarkable for its health. The Memphis Appeal says: "The city of Clarksville is one of the most delightful places in the Union, occupying, as it does, a romantic and healthy site, and possessing a community noted for its social elegance, culture and morality."

Bishop McTyeire said to one of the trustees: "Bro Wright takes to teaching con amore. He pursues it conscientiously, and what is so done is thoroughly done."

Bishop Paine said in a District Conference: "I have known Bro. J. M. Wright for several years, and I most cordially congratulate the friends and patrons of Clarksville Female Academy on securing him as its President, believing that his education, aptitude to impart instruction and his administrative capacity eminently fit him for that dedicate and responsible office."

Greene's
Oxygenated Bitters.

The stomach is one of the most delicate organs of the human system, and the indigestible food crowded into it by the requirements of modern society keep it in which is followed by a resort to tonics and alteratives for relief. It unfortunately happens, however, that many of the medicines used for this purpose contain alcohol, which, poured into a diseased stomach, produces irritation, creates inflammation, and does more injury than good.

Oxygenated Bitters Contain No Alcohol, but are a purely medicinal preparation, which, in cases of Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders, at once restores the stomach to its Natural Condition of Health.

The Oxygenated Bitters have been the most popular remedy for the above complaints for the last Thirty Years, and still maintain their Unrivaled Popularity.

The Greatest
Medical Discovery
Of the Age.

Mr. Kennedy, of Roxbury, has discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

Every Kind of Humor,
from
The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

Roxbury, Mass.

Dear Madam: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skilful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Raw and Inflamed,

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In

The Medical Discovery

you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

Directions for Use.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly,
DONALD KENNEDY.

Dr. Tutts Vegetable Liver Pills.

The best advice that can be given to persons suffering from

Dyspepsia, Bilious Complaints,

Constipation, Colic, Sick Headache,

Fever and Ague, Nervous Debility,

or of any disorder of the Stomach, Liver or Kidneys, is to tone, cleanse and regulate them by the use of

Dr. Tutt's Vegetable Liver Pills.

They act very mildly, yet thoroughly restore the functional action of the Digestive Organs and the Intestines, and renovate the whole system, imparting a good appetite and healthy assimilation of food. They produce neither Nausea, Griping nor Debility, and may be taken at any time, without change of diet or occupation.

The Child's Corner.

THE OLD MAN IN THE WOOD.

There was an old man who lived in the wood,
As you shall plainly see;
He thought he could do more work in one day
Than his wife could do in three.

"With all my heart," the old woman said,
"If you will so allow,
You shall stay at home to-day,
And I'll go follow the plow.

"And you must milk the Tiny cow,
Lest she should go adry;
And you must feed the little pigs
That are within the sty.

"And you must watch the speckled hen,
Lest she should go astray;
Not forgetting the spool of yarn
That I spin every day."

The old woman took her stick in her hand
And went to follow the plow;
The old man put the pail on his head
And went to milk the cow.

But Tiny she winced, and Tiny she flinched,
And Tiny she tossed her nose,
And Tiny gave him a kick on the shin,
Till the blood ran down to his toes.

And a "Ho, Tiny!" and a "Lo, Tiny!"
And a "Pretty little cow, stand still;
And if ever I milk you again," he said,
"It shall be against my will."

And then he went to feed the pigs
That were within the sty;
He knocked his nose against the shed,
And made the blood to fly.

And then he watched the speckled hen,
Lest she should go astray;
But he quite forgot the spool of yarn
That his wife spun every day.

And when the old woman came home at night
He said he could plainly see
That his wife could do more work in a day
Than he could do in three.

And when he saw how well she plowed,
And made the furrows even—
He said his wife could do more work in a day
Than he could do in seven.

The Camel and the Desert.

It was early in the morning that the caravan started; the twilight was growing into day.

The camels had been saddled and burdened and chained, some ten, some twenty, in a row. There were precious things on those camels' backs—silks from India, pearls, ivory, gum, perfumed oils, myrrh, feathers, Angora shawls and velvet. First among the heavily-burdened animals was an old camel-mother; she carried ice from Tartary for a pasha's cellar, a burden that would not appear very valuable to a European child. By her side trudged her little camel; it was three years old, and ran nimbly by her side.

"Mother, are the burdens very heavy?" asked the little camel wonderingly.

"Yes, but not too heavy. Your turn will come next year, little camel; every child has to take up a heavy burden in time."

"It will be a hot journey for us all, and that little one," said a thin, aged camel next in row; "but I prefer carrying perfumes to fighting the Bedouins; my cousin and I went many years ago; they ran away before us, the Bedouins, but they killed my cousin."

A cry of dismay escaped from the camels near, and then nothing more was said, for it was growing hot.

Many days did they journey; nothing but hot sand everywhere.

It was midday; the sun stood horizontal, and seemed to hang like lead over man and animal. The owners of the merchandise had wrapped themselves close in their burnous; only their black eyes were visible. The drivers crept slowly by their camels, every now and then speaking a kind word to them or singing a song, and the faithful creatures turned and licked their hands and hasted their pace, as if they knew that on them depended the safety of all.

"I am tired," said the little camel very often; but the mother answered: "It is good to become inured to hardships when you are very young; I have had many journeys more weury than this and reached the end."

"Mother," continued the little camel, "some of the camels behind us won't go on; the drivers are scolding them."

"Never be unwilling to carry your burden, and you will not get scolded."

Yesterday the drivers cheered their camels with kind words and songs, but to-day not a sound was heard but sighs here and there. It was the fifth day since the camels tasted any water; the precious ice on the camel-mother's back had long been consumed. What was to be their fate?

Just then a groan was heard in the rear, the voice of a driver in anger, then a moan less loud and one more feeble, and the angry voice of the driver again. He had picked up a parcel of silken shawls, cast away by a merchant to ease his animal's load, and the driver had put them on his own camel, intending to appropriate them, and the overburdened animal had sunk under the weight.

"It is a punishment for avarice?" said the old camel to the little one; "he has learned his lesson too late."

The driver took the burden off the poor camel; he coaxed it, he whipped it in vain; it did not rise. With mournful eyes it watched the caravan, that slowly moved on; sadly stretched itself in the sand, as if it knew its fate. The avaricious driver had to sacrifice the merchandise and camel unless he would share the fate of his beast of burden.

"Mother, look at those angry-looking birds flying around us!" cried the terrified little camel.

"They are sent as a warning to keep steadily together and not to flag. We are the first, and must keep up, not give in."

"Why do we not reach any water?" asked the weary little camel again.

At that moment a glorious vision presented itself to the weary caravan. In the distance a sea showed itself, then arose walls with flowing flags, peaceful huts and sunny gardens.

"Oh, mother, let us hasten there," cried the little camel.

"Beware, little one!" said the old camel; "it is a wicked illusion, more cruel than the birds of prey that hover around us to devour us; if we were to follow it it would lead us farther into the hot desert. More dangerous are the pleasures that would lead us to destruction than the open dangers that beset our path. What you see is a mirage."

The little camel did not understand, but tried to keep up bravely by its mother's side.

The caravan was dragging wearily along; sometimes in despair a cheering word arose from one of the drivers to the patient animals, upon whose strength the fate of the whole caravan depended. Even the lion's voice would have betokened the nearness of vegetation.

Listlessly the guidance was left to the camels, whose instinct was a sure guide.

Alas, the old camel-mother looked very anxiously at the hot sand stretching before them, and then at her little one. Was it instinct or mother's love that made her keep on and not lose hope?

The sun was sinking and the shadows falling over the yellow sand when the camel-mother stretched her neck high into the air, sniffed and cried. With a wild effort, as if she would burst her bonds, she rushed forward. A cry of joy broke from the caravan, for they knew the unerring instinct of the camel, that can perceive water at a few hours' distance. All eyes looked bright, all limbs were full of life. It might be a few hours, but yet they would reach it some time, and on they pushed, forgetful of all.

At length a well-known sight offered itself to their eyes. A few palm-trees arose in the distance, and between the grass bubbled the fountain. The poor tired ones drank and rested, the little one by the mother's side. The camels were unburdened, and the next morning they started again refreshed. In a few days they reached their journey's end, bearing with them costly merchandise destined for European markets.—Children's Hour.

A Religious Dog.

Here is a dog story which we know our young friends will enjoy. It has the merit of being as true as it is interesting.

Beaver was a country dog, but he spent more time with his toilet than many city-bred puppies. In summer he always took a daily bath in the little pond back of the wagon-house, and in winter, when he had on his thickest coat of brindle fur, he rolled it over and over in the snow, and then finished by giving it a thorough shaking.

He was not at all handsome, but his master considered him very smart. Probably he remembered the old adage: "Brains before beauty."

One day, out by the barn, his master gave him an uncommonly large piece of meat. Beaver smelt it, wagged his thanks, and then trotted away two miles to Cousin Will's brother's, where he had a friend named Ponto.

Ponto was taking a nap under the kitchen-table when Beaver scratched upon the back door. You may be sure the door was opened as soon as his knock was heard, for they said: "Here's Beaver; Will must be coming!" But the dog walked up to Ponto, just touched him with his nose, then away they both went over the hill and up to the barn, where they dined together.

Beaver was very fond of going to church. He would slip away half an hour before the family, for fear of being shut up at home, go around through woods and fields, and come out into the street close by the church, where he would wait for his master. Neither scolding nor whipping availed to send him back. If Cousin Will left him outside he would enter the house as soon as the door was opened. He once, when not allowed to come into the pew, went up and sat down in the pulpit. Another time, when shut up at home, he managed to get away and came trotting up the aisle just as the preacher was giving out his text. His master, to prevent disturbance, motioned him to lie down under his seat, where he soon fell asleep; but unfortunately he had a bad dream, and gave a quick, short bark, which so frightened Will that he hit him with his foot, when Beaver sprang up with a loud outcry, to the great mortification of the family.

After this he was securely fastened at home before breakfast each Sabbath. One morning he was missing, but when they reached the church door they found both Beaver and Ponto waiting for them. Upon inquiry they learned that the cunning fellow went over Saturday night and stayed with his friend, whom he had persuaded to go to church with him. Although not allowed to enter the house, Beaver was not discouraged, but went every Saturday to stay all night with Ponto, that he might be allowed the privilege of attending religious worship. To the surprise of both families, he never made a mistake, nor could they find out how he knew which was Saturday. I do not know the history of his last days, but I have an impression that he died a martyr to his love of church-going. Aspros, in Christian at Work.

KEEP STILL.—We fancy this is what every small boy would like to say if he only knew how:

"Keep still! That's what they always say to us boys. Just as if there never had been any noise in the world until we were born. Haven't old folks all been boys and girls once? Didn't some of them get boxed on the ears at school? Didn't some of them drum on the milk pans or crack nuts with the flatiron or slam the doors? Everything that is smart goes off with a bang. This would be a dull world if it were not for the racket the boys make. Noisy boys are not always saucy. Some are, but we are not. We belong to the 'Boy's Rattle-te-bang Society of Good Manners,' and we invite all our young friends to come and join us."—Advance.

PET SNAILS.—A little girl writes to the Advance:

"I am going to tell you about some snails that I had in Kansas last year. Mother gave me a glass can and I got a few water snails and put them into it with some water. They multiplied very fast. The old snails laid their eggs on the sides of the can. This year I have some tadpoles, and I am going to see them wiggle their tails off."

THE virtue of prosperity is temperance; the virtue of adversity is fortitude.

Farm, Garden and Household.

A Word for the Birds.

The following story, from the Brooklyn Argus, is literally true. It testifies, more than volumes of argument, to the utility of birds to the farmer and to every citizen.

"June is the loveliest month of all the year. A few years ago it was the most intolerable season in which to live in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, owing to the myriads of pestilential worms that devoured the foliage and dangled themselves from the trees in the faces of disconsolate men and affrighted women. Nature had no sooner clothed the trees with foliage than millions of worms came from their hiding-places to feed upon the leaves. Brooklyn is famed for its numerous trees, the leaves of which, if stripped from the branches, would doubtless weigh tons, and make several piles as large as the Pyramids. But the worms were so numerous that every leaf was devoured by them, and not enough to satisfy at that. They made dessert from off board fences and shingled houses.

"We have seen all the pedestrians of the city driven from the sidewalks, betaking themselves to the center of the street, all on account of the worms. Even the sanctity of the church was not secure against their inroads, and many times the blessed word was turned aside in order to kill the worm sporting from gay ribbons or crawling out from folds of lace.

"Breakfast-tables were not infrequently adorned by these uninvited guests, and vegetable soup for dinner was sometimes extemporized into vermicelli by the admixture of the curious inspectors of dinner service.

"The people talked about worms, newspapers discussed them, societies offered premiums for a discovery of a means of exterminating them, and hundreds were the experiments tried. Chemicals were poured upon the ground, underneath trees, to kill the eggs, which some said were deposited there. The bark of trees was shaven and the trunks whitewashed. Tar rope was tightly drawn around them, cups of poisonous fluids were suspended in the branches, but all to no purpose. Six-foot man acknowledged himself unable to cope with the one-inch measuring-worm.

"Just then came along some little hopping and chirping birds—exiled sparrows in a strange land. They are not pretty to look upon, neither are their voices those of the nightingale; but they were considerable eaters, and were fond of worm diet. So some houses were made for the sparrows, and a large company of them were invited from across the Atlantic ocean to a great feast upon American worms. The strangers accepted the invitation, and had no sooner landed in our parks than they made themselves perfectly at home—built nests, laid eggs, brooded lots of little sparrows, and commenced their battle with the worms. They stuck to their business like Martin Luther's thesis—beginning from the old church door—and they are not through breakfast yet. But the worms are gone; the trees are green again, and there is no place in all the country quite as pleasant to live in, during the month of June, as is Brooklyn."

The Garden.

Too little attention is usually paid to the fall and winter garden. In this climate nearly all vegetables may be gathered fresh from the ground in the late as well as the early months of the year, and it is a sin against our climate advantages that we do not turn them more to our benefit. January and July are the great gardening months for the Southern States, and the work for one is almost a duplication of the other, differing in this, however: that in July we must cultivate more thoroughly and deeply, and use more perfectly decomposed manures. Now is the time to sow early and late cabbages, kohlrabis, cauliflower, broccoli, endive, mustard, carrots, parsnips, beets, mangolds, celery, lettuce, brocole, etc. Snap beans, cucumbers, okra and melons may also be planted. All vegetable and flower seeds should be gathered as soon as ripe, thoroughly dried in the shade and then stored away in cloth bags that have previously been soaked in strong salt and water. We have thought that seeds thus kept retain their vitality longer; we know that they are less liable to damage from insects. Flowering plants and shrubs are kept in bloom much longer by having the blossoms removed just as soon as they begin to fade. Especially is this the case with roses and dahlias. Gladiolus bulbs, kept back for late blooming, should now be planted, in rich, sandy soil, and kept carefully tied to small, neat stakes as they grow. Layers of roses, ornamental shrubs, grape-vines, etc., may yet be made, mulching the earth well over the buried part; keep the hoe, rake and watering-pot constantly going, and then trust a beneficent Providence for the result; never depend on faith alone!—Our Home Journal.

The Effect of Odor in Milk.

For the use of the calf the odor in the milk of a healthy cow is not objectionable. It helps on the process of digestion, and increases the laxative tendency of new milk. In butter and cheese it is detrimental. It promotes a strong, disagreeable flavor, and hastens the decomposition of both. The more of it there is carried into butter the stronger will be its flavor, and the more easily will it become rancid. In the heat of summer, when the cows are feverish, there is more of it in the milk than usual, and more works into the butter, increasing its tendency to rancidity to such a degree as to make it extremely difficult to preserve. To cheese it is equally injurious. It promotes huffing and a disagreeable odor and flavor and premature decay.

To separate this odor and its cause from milk is therefore one of the most important requisites to successful dairying. To carry into butter all the odor there is in new milk, and all there is formed in it while it is standing for the cream to rise, would be to ruin it for use as food. If the correctness of this statement is not recognized, the following experiment will demonstrate it. Put a small quantity of new milk into a tin vessel, say a pint or a quart into a two-quart tin pail, so that it will readily assume the temperature of the room. Put on the cover and let it stand in the milk-room long enough for the cream to rise, and then examine by smelling and tasting. If the observer does not find that odor has accumulated to such an extent as to spoil it for butter, it will be because his senses of taste and smell are sadly out of order. It will become decidedly offensive. We wish every one who uses milk for butter-making, if he has never done so, to try such an experiment. It will cost but a penny or two, and but very little trouble, and will afford an instructive lesson in regard to the rapid changes that are going on in milk, and the steady formation of offensive odor that results from them, and be suggestive of the treatment milk should receive. Canada Farmer.

Canning Fruit.

I remember, at our State fair, a few years ago, hearing a man lecture on the preservation of fruits. One thought in particular impressed me—that "the fine flavor of any fruit, once lost, could not be regained." So when fruit is heated in open vessels, and the air is full of delicious aroma, our fruit is fast losing its best quality. This is why it is best to fill the jars with fruit before cooking. Another reason why it is best to heat in jars, you avoid crushing, and the liquor is rich and clear. In canning peaches or pears, it is very satisfactory if you have retained the small broken pieces for present consumption, and only filled your cans with large, shapely quarters. The same with grapes and berries. If you wish to realize the exquisite flavor of each fruit, do not spoil it with poor sugar. It is a good way to put what nice white sugar you wish to use through the day into the porcelain kettle in the morning, with a little water, and bring it to a boil, and skim it; then when your bottles or jars of fruit have been heated, fill up with the hot syrup. For lack of anything better, I take a very large copper wash-boiler, place a piece of straw matting or two thicknesses of paper over the bottom, and then arrange the cans, as many as it will hold, and keep upright. You may need some twigs in and around them to keep all firm and in place. Fill with warm water to the necks of the jars, cover them with lids, and put on the boiler cover to keep in the steam. Berries need but a few minutes of boiling heat. By this method, if you do leave them a trifle too long, they are not spoiled by boiling to pieces. Green corn is very nice cooked with sliced ripe tomatoes, two or three hours, slowly, on the stove, and seasoned with sweet cream, salt and pepper when warmed for the table. Corn and tomatoes are better cooked in the porcelain kettle, and should be canned and sealed up in bright tin cans.—Janette Wing, in Country Gentleman.

SWEET POTATOES.—Mr. Editor: J. S., of Franklin county (no postoffice given,) asks how to preserve potato-vines through the winter, so as to plant them in summer. The best-preserved I have known of were kept in an old dry cistern, and not allowed to mat down, or pack so as to heat. They must be kept cool. An old cellar, hole in the ground or loft, or any place where they will have a nearly uniform and cool temperature, will do the work. It has done it. K.

MRS. HOMESPUN'S RUG.—She says: "I am going to knit me a rug out of little bits of cloth and strong brown linen or cotton twine of coarse quality. The bits of black and colored woolen cloths must be cut an inch wide and two inches long, and after every second stitch in the garter stitch knitting one of these bits is put in and knitted down. I shall set up thirty-five stitches of the twine on my coarsest steel or small ivory needles, and knit across twice; then begin and put in the cloth. I think I shall try a pattern of diamonds and crosses, making the ground-work out of an old alpaca dress that is too far gone to do any one any good, and then take scraps from the children's dresses, and bits of bright red, yellow and blue flannel, and knit in the figures on the right side, the twine making the wrong side. The strips are either knitted straight for a yard or more, and then bound off and sewed together, or else three narrow strips are sewed together for the middle, and then the under strips are sewed around, measuring them as you knit, and narrowing at the corners, so as to make them fit in nicely."

LEMONADE.—Have a regular lemon-squeezer, if possible. Strain the juice, and extract a little of the essence from the rind with a few lumps of sugar, which imparts richness to the flavor. Allow three lemons to a quart of water and half a pound of sugar, as a general principle; but such is the diversity in the size and quality of the fruit that no invariable rule can be given. The proportions here suggested will be found ordinarily to make lemonade strong enough to allow of ice being added. If you have plenty of ice, use more, with less water. Always taste and see if the proportions are right before serving.

WET BOOTS.—The Agriculturist gives the following advice to farmers, who, next to fishermen, are apt to get their boots wet through: "When the boots are taken off, fill them quite full with dry oats. This grain has a great fondness for damp, and will rapidly absorb the last vestige of it from the wet leather. As it takes up the moisture it swells and fills the boot like a tightly-fitting last, keeping its form good, and drying the leather without hardening it. In the morning shake out the oats and hang them in a bag near the fire to dry, ready for the next wet night; draw on the boots, and go happily about the day's work."

Scientific.

M. A. BOILLOT describes a new method for preparing ozone by bringing oxygen in the vicinity of electricity passing through broken or pulverized gas carbon contained in a tube.

TENNESSEE OPIUM.—The opium obtained from the imported seed of the white poppy which was planted by Dr. Pitts, in the spring of 1871, near Nashville, Tennessee, possesses the peculiar narcotic odor and bitter taste, and presents a smooth, tenacious mass of a dark-brown color. One hundred grains, when dried, yielded eighty-three of powder, and, upon examination, eleven of insoluble matter, mostly clay and sand, and ten of alkaloids, equal to about nine grains of morphia.

"REINDEER KIDS," says Dr. Rae, "when very young indeed, having been deprived of their mothers and left quite alone, will in spring always turn toward the north, however much you may try to drive them the other way." Buffaloes, as stated by James Mackay, a noted Hudson's Bay Company's guide, whenever they are alarmed always run southward. This habit is so constant and so well known that, in making buffalo pounds, the entrance must always face the north, for, if it is not so placed, it is impossible to drive the animals into them.

M. HOCHSTELLER, of Vienna, has been interesting the people of Vienna by an experiment in which he imitates and illustrates, on a small scale, the eruption of volcanoes. It is based on the property possessed by sulphur, when melted under the vapor of water having a pressure of three atmospheres, to absorb a certain quantity of the water, which afterward escapes in the form of vapors during the cooling. In operating on a quintal of sulphur a superficial crust formed, an opening being made in which pieces of sulphur emerged, accompanied with explosions and puffs of vapor. At the end of an hour it formed a cone, having a diameter of from twelve to twenty inches at the base and about three inches in height, and exactly resembling in form and appearance the natural volcano cone resulting from the successive accumulations of lava streams.

ARTIFICIAL BUTTER.—As experiments have demonstrated that cows living on very scanty diet still secreted milk containing butter, it became evident that the butter must have been prepared from the fatty tissues of the animal. This led to a series of experiments on splitting up animal fats, which have resulted in the preparation of an artificial butter from suets. The suet is first finely divided by circular saws in a cylinder. It is then treated with water, carbonate of potassa, and finely-divided fresh sheep's stomachs at a temperature of 45° C. The pepsin and heat separate the fat, which floats on the surface, whence it is decanted, and when cool placed in a hydraulic press, which separates the stearine from the semi-fluid oleomargarine, which is employed as follows in the preparation of the butter: 50 kilogrammes of the fat, 25 liters of milk and 20 liters of water are placed in a churn; to this 100 grammes of the soluble matter obtained from cows' udders and milk-glands is added, together with a little anotta. The mixture is then churned, when the butter separates in the usual manner.—Scribner's Monthly.

SUCCESS BASED UPON MERIT.

It is a subject of general remark, among both wholesale and retail druggists, that no medicine introduced to the American public has ever gained such a popularity and met with so large a sale in all parts of the land, in the same length of time, as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. This cannot depend upon its having been more largely advertised than any other medicine, as such is not the case. The correct explanation, we think, is found in the fact that this medicine produces the most wonderful and perfect cures of very bad cases of bronchial, throat and lung diseases, is undoubtedly the most perfect and efficient remedy for all kinds of coughs that has ever been introduced to the public, and at the same time possesses the greatest of blood-purifying and strengthening properties that medical science has been able to produce, thus rendering it a sovereign remedy not only in the cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Hoarseness and Coughs, but also for all diseases of the liver and blood, as scrofulous diseases, blotches, rough skin, pimples, black specks and discolorations. It has therefore a wide range of application and usefulness, and it not only gives the most perfect satisfaction to all who use it, but far exceeds the expectations of the most sanguine, thus eliciting the loudest praise, and making permanent, living advertising mediums of all who use it. For these reasons it is that there is not perhaps a druggist in all the vast domain of this continent, who tries to please his customers and supply their wants, that does not keep and sell large quantities of this most valuable medicine.

JESUP, IOWA, May 5, 1873.

DR. R. V. PIERCE—Dear Sir: We take pleasure in saying that your medicines have sold entirely beyond our expectations. We regard them as the best medicines extant, and hear them spoken of in the highest terms of praise.

TO THE SUFFERERS

WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with that painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," as a medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this painful disease, with this medicine; and, what assures most, the patient recovered by the use of the bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not receive by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not afflicted with Rheumatism at all. This being the time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to thousands already cured by it.

A CONVERSATION FAN.

No family circle is complete in social diversions and entertainments without one, and in order to enjoy the pastime it should be distinctly understood that the answers do not numerically follow the questions, but to spice the amusement an answer must be looked for that will afford a fitting response to an interrogatory.

Where a direct answer is not to be found to a direct question, it will be discovered that it furnishes the sequel to a sustained conversation, so that couples can carry on a tete-a-tete, which they may not wish to make audible, by silent indications of numbers.

THE CONVERSATION FAN

is an infallible remedy against dullness, breaking the spell of silence by a suggestive inquiry, furnishing congenial pleasures for an evening's entertainment, and opening up a novel and ingenious method of whiling away agreeable hours at home, in the promenade, at a party or private gathering.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE,
STAUNTON, VIRGINIA,

will begin its Twenty-fifth Annual Session SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

REV. W. A. HARRIS, D. D., President, with an able corps of twenty-three teachers and officers. Modern languages taught and spoken by European teachers. Music by seven professors and teachers, among whom are two of the most cultivated teachers of vocal music in the South.

This is one of the healthiest climates in the world. Its marked effect is the rapid promotion of the physical health and vigor of our pupils. Those who come here from the South, with feeble constitutions, chills and climatic diseases, are entirely restored.

Buildings elegant, fanned by the purest breezes, and commanding the most magnificent rural and mountain scenery, making it one of the most delightful college homes in the Union.

The last session one hundred and eleven young ladies attended this school, as boarding pupils, from fifteen Southern States.

Extracts from Testimonials.

From Bishop D. S. Doggett, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, located in Staunton, Virginia, under the presidency of Rev. W. A. Harris, is, in my judgment, one of the best institutions for young ladies in the South. I have occasion to know and appreciate its value by the advantages enjoyed by one of my daughters, now a pupil there. It possesses all the facilities of a thorough female education. Its personal accommodations are all that can be desired for health and comfort or taste. No location could be more eligible, no scenery more magnificent, no atmosphere more salubrious. It is now in a state of great prosperity. I do not hesitate to recommend it to the patronage of all who wish their daughters to receive the benefits of a useful and ornamental culture.

D. S. DOGGETT.

From Bishop E. M. Marvin, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute is an honor to the church. Instruction is thorough. All classes stand high. Its music advantages are offered of a very high order. The most talented professors are employed, and neither pains nor expense are spared to make this department eminent. The school is very prosperous, and deserves to be so.

E. M. MARVIN.

From Prof. E. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, deserves the brilliant success it enjoys. It has a good corps of teachers, a beautiful situation and excellent management. Having had a daughter under Mr. Harris' care during the present session, my observation leads me to believe this school to be one of the best of female seminaries which adorn our State. FRANCIS H. SMITH.

IMPROVED

EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the tenth instant:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	693
Lake		1
Mobile		183

Total		903

On Saturday the Liverpool market was reported dull, with sales of 10,000 bales at previous rates, and New York steady for spots, but with the additional note that the sales were chiefly under quotations, while futures were reported as closing at an advance of 3-32 @ 5-32c. These dispatches were not calculated to have any marked influence, but most buyers withdrew, and the sales were consequently confined to a few small lots, amounting up 125 bales. On Monday the business was again too limited to establish quotations, being confined to 225 bales. On Tuesday the demand exhibited more vitality, and 650 bales changed hands at irregular prices. The prices paid showed an unusually wide range in all descriptions, factors being compelled to accept inside rates, or occasionally even less, for small lots pressed on buyers to close consignments, while on the other hand the latter could not fill orders of any magnitude for desirable kinds without paying outside rates. We noticed some demand for low middling, good style, at 16c., but most holders of the description asked 16¼c., and even 16½c., and the orders were only partially executed. On the other hand, a small lot of average low middling was offered at 15¾c.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 1,000 bales, against 1,900 for the corresponding time last week and 2,100 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,210,771 bales, against 1,228,814 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 235,569 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 113,189 to France, of 111,790 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 31,252 to Great Britain. We quote:

Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, July 15.—The cotton planters' reports to the Department of Agriculture, in accordance with the conditional promise of their June report, show an increase in the condition of the plant in every State. The percentages of average condition are higher than in June by the following figures: 3 in Louisiana, 4 in Arkansas, 6 in Florida, 7 in South Carolina, 9 in Mississippi, 10 in Alabama, 11 in Georgia, 12 in Tennessee and Texas, 13 in North Carolina.

Texas and North Carolina return a condition above the average.

The following are the State averages: North Carolina, 102; South Carolina, 88; Georgia, 91; Florida, 96; Alabama, 92; Mississippi, 87; Louisiana, 73; Texas, 102; Arkansas, 94; Tennessee, 97.

As compared with July of last year, the condition is higher, except in Florida, Louisiana and Arkansas, though the difference is slight in Tennessee and Georgia, and not very wide in Mississippi and Alabama.

CHICAGO, July 15, 2.30 A. M.—The limits of the fire are as follows: On Clark street, No. 535, which is about Twelfth street on the south, and about Polk street on the north. On Dearborn street the southern limit is near Twelfth street and the northern limit is Polk street. On Wabash avenue Harmon Court forms the southern boundary, and the northern limit being between Jackson and Van Buren streets, on State street. The southern limit is Harmon Court, the line extending on the north nearly to Jackson street. Third and Fourth avenues are burned nearly the whole entire length. The fire burned a number of houses on Michigan avenue, but has not damaged that street to any great extent. Twenty blocks are burned.

The loss is variously estimated, but cannot be given with accuracy. It will not be less than $4,000,000, and probably will not be over $6,000,000.

This is covered by about two-fifths insurance, which is divided among numerous companies. Since the great fire the companies have been very careful not to take large risks in one locality.

The following are the largest losses: The Jewish synagogue, $30,000; Quinn's chapel, $15,000; the Adelphi theater, $75,000; St. James Hotel and furniture, $150,000; the postoffice, $50,000; the First Baptist church, $100,000; the Church of the Messiah, $25,000; Olivet Baptist church (colored,) $40,000. A number of serious casualties are reported, and several persons were doubtless lost in the flames.

The fire is now completely under control, and no further anxiety for the safety of property on the north side of the city.

NEW YORK, July 18.—The physicians in the case of McCormick, in their report, recommended as a measure of precaution that a person bitten by any dog, or any other animal, shall at once, if a wound is received in a part where it is proper to practice excision, be subjected to excision at once, in a thorough manner, and that the wound be allowed to bleed for a few minutes in a basin of warm water, and finally cauterized with nitrate of silver, caustic potassia, nitric acid, a hot iron or burning coal. In case a surgeon cannot be found to practice excision the patient should apply a cord above the wound, and then suck the part, provided he has no excoriations in his mouth.

CHICAGO, July 19.—In answer to a call about twelve hundred citizens met to-night to consider means of avoiding a repetition of the late fire. Resolutions were adopted demanding the immediate removal or destruction of all wooden buildings within the fire limits, in violation of the ordinance of 1861, and calling for a law prohibiting the building of wooden structures inside of the corporate limits. The subject, setting apart a considerable portion of the district lately burnt, was urged on the Common Council as worthy of careful consideration. It was suggested also that boulevards three hundred feet wide would be a great protection in case of fire, and the consideration of the question of constructing such was submitted to the same body.

WASHINGTON, July 21.—The Secretary of War has ordered that the army pursue and punish the guilty Indians wherever found, even going upon their reservations, though care is to be taken to prevent striking innocent Indians.

A telegram was received at the Executive mansion this morning from Sterling Goveruor Davis, of Mississippi, stating that party feeling in Vicksburg was very high there on account of the election to take place August 4, and requesting the presence of United States troops to prevent an outbreak.

VICKSBURG, July 21.—Mayor Beck, in a message to the President, protests against the call for troops.

GALVESTON, July 21.—A News' Austin special says: "Late intelligence received by Adjutant General Steele from the Indian territory states that on June 28 the Comanches, Kiowas and Cheyennes attacked a settlement at Dotey's Wells, the panhandle of Texas, and were repulsed with a loss of fifteen killed and twenty-three wounded, and a large number of horses were killed."

MOBILE, July 21.—The boll and army worm have appeared in middle Alabama, eastern Mississippi, and so many parishes in Louisiana. Three large plantations in middle Alabama have been entirely destroyed within three days.

FOREIGN.

CITY OF MEXICO, July 14.—A banquet was given on the fourth instant in honor of the American Independence. All Americans here were present, and the dinner was also attended by President Lerdo de Tejada, members of the cabinet, diplomatic corps and leading men of the country and press. Minister Foster presided. The Declaration of Independence was read, patriotic poems recited, and cordial toasts exchanged.

There are now ninety-eight Protestant churches in Mexico; five years ago there were less than sixty-one.

The United States steamer Richmond arrived at Mazatlan recently. Customary salutes were fired.

MADRID, July 16.—The Carlists have ordered one Republican prisoner to be shot for every shell fired by the fleet off Bilbao.

HAVANA, July 16.—Many fatal cases of vomito have occurred in the shipping, and some in the city.

Smallpox is also prevalent.

KISSENGEN, July 16.—The wounds received by Bismarck in the wrist are nearly healed. Another was caused by the burning wad of the assassin's pistol, which scorched the flesh; it is still painful, and inflammation is slowly subsiding. Kullman has been removed to Murzburg.

MADRID, July 17.—There was a riot at Lerida yesterday, arising from the opposition of the people to a certain tax. The troops suppressed disorder. Several persons were injured.

The Carlists have burned several houses in the suburbs of Cuenca, and killed many of the inhabitants.

PARIS, July 17.—Madrid journals state that the Carlists have seized sixteen hundred women and children on the Cantabrian coast and in Biscay, intending to hold them as hostages, to be shot in case of an attack by the Republicans.

BERLIN, July 17.—The French embassador here has sent congratulations to Bismarck on his escape.

HAVANA, July 19.—A column of troops from Holguin have encountered the insurgents in the hills of Bijara, under Calista Garcia. The position of the latter was captured after five hours' firing, and the insurgents dispersed, leaving several dead and prisoners. The Spaniards lost one private killed, and an officer and seven privates wounded. The column, after reprovisioning, started in pursuit of the insurgents.

MADRID, July 20.—A proclamation has been issued supplementary to the decree establishing the state of siege. It declares that the charges of sedition or conspiration against the State shall be tried by court martial, and the person convicted of interfering with the operation of the railways or telegraphs shall suffer death.

CALCUTTA.—The rivers from Assam to Oude have overflowed their banks and the country is flooded. The damage is very great.

HAVANA, July 21.—The death sentence pronounced against the American, Dockeray, has been commuted to ten years' imprisonment by President Serrano, at the instance of Captain-General Concha.

The Cotton Worm.

AN INTERESTING LETTER ON THE SUBJECT.

It will be remembered that several weeks ago the Picayune had an article relative to the destruction of cotton worms, wherein was described a plan adopted last year by certain farmers in St. Landry. Herewith we give a letter from Colonel John M. Sandidge, one of our prominent business men and a planter of large experience, advocating identically the same theory, and authoritatively affirming its perfect efficiency.

Apropos of the same subject, we have received a suggestion from another of our leading merchants, to which reference will be made at another time. Meanwhile we commend the letter of Mr. Sandidge to our country friends.

"To the Editor of the Picayune:

"Knowing the nervous anxiety of all cotton planters about their crops at this season of the year, and the general fear of the cotton worm, allow me to suggest, through your paper, to all of them that a means of destruction can be readily applied, should there be occasion, without resorting to the costly and somewhat dangerous use of 'Paris Green,' and may be relied on with quite as much confidence as any of the poisons.

"It is known that any violent agitation of the cotton stalk or leaf on which the worm is feeding causes them to double up and spring off. Getting them to the ground when they are young, very many would perish (if nothing more was done,) not finding their way up the plant again; but, to make the thing sure, they should be buried at once. With many other ways for the accomplishment of the same purpose, to get the worms to the ground, perhaps the simplest would be for two men or boys, on horses or mules, keeping one row of cotton between them, to ride from one end of the row to the other, each holding an end of a piece of bagging or other heavy cloth twenty-five or thirty feet in length, so that it would, in a sort of loop behind their horses, be dragged over the cotton row between them. Passing over in that way, they should return along the same row, thus pulling the stalks in both directions, with two good shakings.

"To be still more effective, some small brush, hanging down from across the pommel of the saddle, could be made to tickle the side limbs of each plant; and, to finish the job, should come right after the plowman with a 'buzzard wing' or some similar sweep, sufficiently wide to clean out the row with a single furrow and cover up the worms, by that time all on the ground.

"To the hames of the gear, on the animal drawing the plow, might be attached some brush that would again shake the side limbs of the cotton stalks immediately ahead of the sweep. This operation performed two or three times—or as often as the worms might appear in number—has proved as effective as any application of poison, costs no money, and but little labor, at a time when the labor can be conveniently given, and does much to keep down the late grass and other stuff that would interfere with cotton picking; and I commend it to every cotton grower should the worms appear.

JOHN M. SANDIDGE."

Letter from DeSoto, Louisiana.

MR. EDITOR: The cause of temperance is one of growing interest. The United Friends of Temperance have a council in Mansfield numbering about fifty persons, both men and women, some members of one church and some of another, and others not members of any. We like this organization better than any that we ever belonged to, and we have belonged to everything of the sort that has ever come along for the last twenty-five years. It seems to us that just now is a very important crisis in the cause of temperance.

We do not like a portion of a letter in the ADVOCATE of July 2, copied from the Western Methodist; neither do we like the editor's hearty sanction of it. We do not see the force of the argument that a specific law will weaken the moral force of a general law. Let that be as it may; we do see the necessity of a specific law upon the subject. The General Rule is: "Drunkenness, or drinking spirituous liquors, unless in cases of necessity." Now the objection to a specific law is that the spirit and intent of the general one prohibits making and selling as well as drinking spirituous liquors as a beverage. But who sees it in that light? Who reads it that way? Who draws that inference from it? It took all the Bishops of the church, with all their sagacity, we believe, about one hundred years to draw that conclusion from the rule. We need quicker, plainer work to save the church. We hope that the Annual Conferences will be wide awake, and that they will heartily concur with the General Conference which recommended a specific law upon the subject by a vote of 138 to 35. The Denver Conference comes first in order, and we sincerely hope that it will, with a vim peculiar to those Western men, give a unanimous vote as an example to be followed by the rest. We shall look out for it.

The Stuart family, who have been so long with us, and who have done so much for the cause of education and in keeping up the schools in Mansfield, both male and female, have gone with the Texas tide. Here still remains a place and a work for two efficient educators. The college is in good repair, and invites an occupant, while any man with grace enough to manage boys can command from thirty to sixty of them. We have good churches, good society and a healthy country, and we want good teachers.

The drouth has injured the country somewhat; but the rain has come and crops are rapidly improving, and the prospect for a crop now is fair, and for cotton very good.

You talk about the young man struggling for bread, and about being tempted to do something degrading rather than starve. There is no country in the world, of which we have had any knowledge, where a man can make a living more easily than he can in this same Louisiana. There may be exceptions, but the grand struggle, in our judgment, is to get the consent to go to work. We know of no workingman who has not bread enough and to spare. We have had some experience between work and not work. It is much more agreeable to human nature not to work, but it is much better both for soul and body to work.

We will have a camp meeting at Bethel camp ground, commencing on the fourth day of September next, which in the main will be self-supporting, yet there will be some ten or a dozen tents. Preachers and people are invited. We are praying for a gracious revival of religion.

Politicians are raging, Grangers are sanguine, and life insurance agents have the very thing to provide against all future exigencies; hence, our temporal interests being so well guarded, we may look to the interests of the church and labor for the salvation of souls. J. P.

MANSFIELD, LA., July 8, 1874.

NAUTICAL VIEW OF THE COMET. We were told by a celebrated naval officer the following anecdote: On one of his cruises the sailors saw a comet, and were somewhat surprised and alarmed at its appearance. The hands met and appointed a committee to wait upon the commander and ask his opinion of it. They approached him and said:

"We want to ask your opinion, your honor."

"Well, my boys, what is it about?"

"We want to inquire about that thing up there."

"Now, before I answer you, let me know what you think of it."

"Well, your honor, we have talked it all over, and we think it is a star sprung a leak."—London Letter.

THE TIDES.

Up the long slopes of this low, sandy shore
Are rolled the tidal waters day by day;
Traces of wandering feet are washed away,
Relics of busy hands are seen no more.
The soiled and trampled surface is smoothed o'er
By ouncetual waves that high behests obey;
Once and again the tides assert their sway,
And o'er the sands their cleansing waters pour.
Even so, Lord, daily, hourly, o'er my soul,
Sin-stained and care worn, let thy heavenly Grace—
A blest atoning flood—divinely roll,
And all the footsteps of the world efface,
That, like the wave-washed sand, this soul of mine,
Spotless and fair, smooth and serene, may shine!

Sunday at Home.

Ritualism.

The following is taken from the proceedings of the convention in May last:

The Protestant Episcopal Convention of the diocese of New Jersey reassembled on Thursday morning in Grace church, Newark, New Jersey. Dr. Schuyler's resolution on Ritualism was taken up. He said it was a great mistake to suppose there was any severity in the resolution, or any personal feeling on his part toward men with whom he had heretofore acted. He was a High Churchman, and felt sorry he could not stand shoulder to shoulder with the men with whom he had been associated. This was not a question of eucharistic adoration, but of unity, of public worship, which the pastoral letter of the Bishop was intended to secure. It was a question of respect for law and authority. The resolutions were the logical and necessary sequence of the facts set forth in the preamble. Those who advance into excesses unauthorized by law, or sink into omissions also unauthorized, are alike within the scope of the resolutions. He referred to the charge of the Bishop in the Tyng case, and said the time had come when the same instrument of canon law is to be used against the other side.

The Rev. Mr. Goldsborough offered the following resolution as a substitute:

"Whereas, The last General Convention has legislated on the subject of alleged irregularities in the celebration of divine service, this convention considers the further agitation of that matter by the General Convention expedient and advisable."

In offering the substitute he said he wanted to know if any member of the diocese was guilty of unseemly practices. He acknowledged that he believed in the real presence which the prayer-book teaches. He had choral service in his church, and if he was wrong he wanted to be cited before the convention and tried for it. He believed in an ornate service, and chose to celebrate it in that way, provided he did not contravene the authority of his Bishop. Let us have toleration, said he; do not try to drive us out of the church because we try to draw souls to God by that method.

A GENUINE SENSATION was occasioned by the Rev. Dr. Nicholson, of Trinity church, Newark, who, in the course of a vigorous anti-ritualistic speech, brought the matter home to Grace church. He, too, loved toleration, but there should be a limit. "They tell us," said he, "that three years ago irregularities existed. They asked the General Convention to pass a canon prohibiting the carrying of a cross—is that done or not? the use of lights about the holy table when not necessary—behold, gentlemen, look!" and the reverend gentleman pointed to the altar of the church in which he stood, whereon stood two large candlesticks with long wax candles in them, and other High Church altar table appanages. "Some," he said, "were by these things prevented from attending worship at Grace church at the opening of the convention."

When he entered the church he saw no such diversities in services. Now no one could enter one of these new-fashioned churches and understand the service. It was time for action. There are doctrines symbolized which are not in accordance with our standards. The principle of eucharistic adoration and the so-called real presence were lately condemned and declared not to be doctrines of this church in the Bennett case. If the real presence were the doctrine, loyalty to his Master would compel him to leave it. He finds no such doctrine in Scripture. There is a real presence, not in the elements, but in the heart of the receiver. Their church, in her articles, teaches no other real presence.

After considerable further debate the following substitute, offered by Rev. Dr. Garrison, was offered and carried by a vote of 34 clerics to 24, 17 lay to 11:

"Resolved, That the following be adopted as a minute of this convention, and a copy hereof be transmitted to each house of the General Convention:

"The churchmen of New Jersey have received with dutiful reverence and with very great satisfaction the wise words of their right reverend fathers in the pastoral letter of 1871, touching the subject of ritual.

"The Diocesan Convention in this its ninety-first annual session adopts those words of the Bishops as the expression of its own conviction, to wit:

"1. That 'what is known as ritualism is mainly a question of taste, temperament and constitution until it becomes the expression of doctrine;' and

"2. That whatsoever 'ritual of posture' there may be 'lately introduced among us, which undoubtedly inculcates and encourages what is known as eucharistic adoration, finds no warrant in our office for the administration of the holy communion.'

"In the confidence inspired by the goodly counsels of the Bishops in their pastorate, the churchmen of New Jersey rest assured of what they earnestly desire, that whatever action the General Convention may deem it wise to take on the subject will proceed upon the principles thus already indicated by the utterance of the upper house."

Mansfield (La.) Female College.

MR. EDITOR: The annual examination of this institution commenced on Saturday, the twenty-seventh day of June, and closed on Tuesday, the thirtieth.

Wednesday, July 1, was celebrated as commencement day in all particulars, except that there were no graduates, owing to the interruption in the college course last fall by yellow fever. The examination, as characteristic to the institution, was critical and thorough. The young ladies exhibited thorough training, and acquitted themselves with honor.

At the urgent request of the young ladies of the college, the president, Rev. C. B. Stuart, preached the commencement sermon. The subject was well selected and ably handled. It was not speculative and theoretical, but it was eminently practical. He presented clearly and forcibly the great principles and doctrines of Christianity.

The concerts, one for the "old folks" and one for the young, superintended by Mrs. Humphrey, were largely attended. The first was antique in styles, and afforded freshness and amusement. The second was exquisite and entertaining. The poetic and prose recitations by the young ladies were not only elegant, but they were splendid. After which came the annual literary address. It was delivered by Major Hersey, of Shreveport, Louisiana. The major wields the pen of a ready writer. His speech was clear, strong and forcible. He made some allusion to the late civil war, and dwelt somewhat upon the present political state of the country. He then presented us with his idea of a true woman, especially a true Southern woman. It was replete with apt and beautiful illustrations, taken from both ancient and modern times. The language, from beginning to end, was chaste, beautiful and eloquent. He was listened to by a large, attentive and admiring audience.

At the close of Major Hersey's address President Stuart came forward and made a few pointed and very touching remarks. He stated that nearly fourteen years ago he became connected with Mansfield Female College as president. His constant and undivided attention has been given to promote the best interests of the college—except for a short period he was repulsed and forced to yield to the inexorable laws of civil war; that he had ever striven to maintain a high grade of scholarship in the institution, and was not conscious of having ever wronged man, woman or child since his connection with the college. He entertained the kindest feelings for the community, and the deepest interest for the well-being and prosperity of the college; and here he announced publicly, as he had done previously to the board of managers, his resignation. Whereupon J. L. Seales, Esq., secretary of the board, and in its behalf, read the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, The Rev. C. B. Stuart, president of Mansfield Female College, has found it to his interest to resign his position as president of said college, to take charge of the Masonic Institute of Learning, at Marshall, Texas; And whereas, His resignation was voluntary and not at the instance of the board of managers; therefore,

Resolved, That the board of managers tender to him their kindest regards and sympathies for the faithful and just administration which he has exercised over the college for the last thirteen years, for his prompt and faithful manner of settling all financial matters with the board, and for keeping the college property in good and neat repair.

Resolved, That while we tender to him our warmest gratitude for his efforts to promote the educational interests of the college, we would also tender to him, in behalf of the church and Sunday school, our gratitude for his faithful labors in the pulpit, and in all the interests of the church, since he has been with us.

Resolved, That we deem his absence from our society a loss to be regretted by all, both in the educational and religious interest of our community.

Resolved, That feeling deeply, as we do, the loss we sustain in the voluntary removal of President Stuart from our community, and in his resignation of the presidency of the Mansfield Female College, we wish him great success in his future field of labor, and commend him as worthy of the confidence, the esteem and patronage of the community in which his lot may be cast.

Doxology and benediction by the Rev. John Pipes.

Periodicals.

WE HAVE RECEIVED a copy of "The Founders and Pioneers of Methodism," an engraving offered as a premium to subscribers to the Christian Age. The engraving is a group of two hundred and fifty-five portraits, and makes a most interesting and valuable picture. We have here in one view nearly all the more noted historical personages connected with the rise and subsequent progress of Methodism. The central group is composed of twenty-five portraits of John Wesley, taken at different periods; the inner circle consists of fourteen portraits of the Wesley family. There are also the prominent founders of Methodism in its various branches in Great Britain, the early missionaries, and the pioneers and founders of American Methodism. The outer circle of the picture is composed of forty-six of the historic mothers of Methodism. Published by the United States Publishing Company for the Christian Age Association, New York, 1874.

THE Methodist Quarterly Review for July, 1874, D. D. Whedon, LL. D., editor, Nelson & Phillips, publishers, has the following table of contents: Ralph Waldo Emerson, Skepticism and Faith Considered as Motive Power, Ewald's History of Israel, Dr. Bender on the New Testament Idea of Miracles, Germany and the Jesuits. In the editorial department are the usual full and valuable Synopsis of the Quarterlies, Foreign Religious Intelligence, Foreign Literary Intelligence, and Quarterly Book-Table.

THE Mississippi Valley Progress is the title of a handsome journal, devoted especially to the interests of immigration, manufacturing, transportation and real estate. It is published at St. Louis, Missouri. The number before us is filled with matters of interest to the West and South.

THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE for July is up to its usual high standard of merit. Of its rich array of articles we note: God's Joy in His People, On the Best Methods of Meeting Unbelief, The Word of Life, A Medieval Ragged School, A Suffering Messiah, Notes from the South Pacific.

THE New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal is a valuable periodical, edited by S. M. Bemiss, M. D. James A. Gresham, proprietor and publisher, 92 Camp street, New Orleans. We have received the number of July, 1874.

THE CHRISTIAN AGE now comes out as a handsome weekly of sixteen pages. Dr. Deems is editor, and, of course, the paper is ably conducted—a first-class paper every way. We wish the Christian Age abundant success.

APPLETON'S RAILWAY AND STEAM NAVIGATION GUIDE is a valuable publication, and a necessary pocket companion for travelers. We have received a copy of the fourth edition, July, 1874.

GOOD WORDS for July has: My Mother and I, The Calcutta Natives, Work and Pray, The Early History of Photography, Notes About Tea, Christian Childhood, and other articles.

MORTON'S MONTHLY HOME AND SCHOOL for July has a good table of contents. We note: Trial by Jury, Home History for Dixie, and Leibnitzians versus Euclid.

THE SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR, published at Athens, Georgia, is an excellent publication, and merits a large patronage. We have received the July number.

MOON'S BEE WORLD for July has been received. This is a handsomely printed monthly, devoted to bee culture. A. F. Moon & Co., publishers, Rome, Georgia.

OUR Sunday school publications for August are on hand, and looking never brighter. All are good. Little People, Visitor and Magazine, all are first-rate.

THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST for July is a very fine number. The engravings are numerous and well executed.

THE POPE EXPELLED FROM THE FREE MASONS.—At the semi-annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Masons, Scottish Rite of the Orient, of Palermo, Italy, on the twenty-seventh of March last, Pope Pius the Ninth was expelled from the order. The decree of expulsion was published in the official Masonic paper at Cologne, Germany, and is preceded by the minutes of the lodge in which he was initiated, and is as follows:

"A man named Mastai Ferretti, who received the baptism of Free Masonry, and solemnly pledged his love and fellowship, and who afterward was crowned Pope and King, under the title of Pio Nono, has now cursed his former brethren, and excommunicated all members of the order of Free Masons. Therefore said Mastai Ferretti is herewith, by decree of the Grand Lodge of the Orient, Palermo, expelled from the order for perjury."

The charges against him were first preferred at his lodge at Palermo in 1865, and notification and copy thereof sent him, with a request to attend the lodge for the purpose of answering the same. To this he made no reply, and, for divers reasons, the charges were not pressed until he urged the Bishops of Brazil to act aggressively toward the Free Masons. Then they were pressed, and after a regular trial a decree of expulsion was entered and published, the same being signed by Victor Emanuel, King of Italy and Grand Master of the Orient of Italy.—The Voice of Masonry.

THURSDAY, JULY 22, 1874.

THE GROVE WAS GOD'S FIRST TEMPLE.

The grove was God's first dwelling-place;
'Twas here, at early morn and dewy eve,
His earnest worshiper, with beaming face,
Came, his kind blessing to receive.

'Twas here he came to breathe his prayer,
Pure as the rosy clouds which o'er him bent,
And out upon the fresh and gentle air
It stole across the firmament.

He walked adown the woodland aisles,
A temple grander than man ever made,
And where the violet sky-high) ever smiles
He knelt before his God and prayed.

'Twas here he came to make his vows,
Ere man had learned to lay the chiseled stone,
And build thereon a stately, noble house:
'Twas here he sought his Master's throne.

O sweet it is to seek the grove
In this cold age of progress and of art,
And there kneel down with ministers of love,
And ope to God the hardened heart.

Father! thy hand hath reared this dome
Through which yet floats the fragrant heavenly breath,
And when into its stately halls I come,
From me is driven each thought of death.

All, all is beautiful and fair!
And as the gentle zephyrs round me play
I thank thee for thy tenderness and care,
As now I tread life's thorny way.

'Tis here I come at matin hour,
When all is silent save the hunter's horn,
To kneel beside some blooming woodland flower,
And praise thee in the early morn.

And when the sunset fades away,
And shadows drift across the amber west,
I come into the forest aisles to pray
To thee, O God, for peace and rest.

Christian Faith—What Is It?—No. 2.

It is an easy matter to exercise faith, and to become a Christian, if we would only impress upon the minds of those seeking pardon that faith consists in simply taking God at his word, and confidently relying upon his promises. Why should we not do this? Is it not strictly in accordance with the teachings of Scripture? Repentance is absolutely essential, 'tis very true—"That godly sorrow which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of."

But God is represented, throughout the Scriptures, to be Love, to be merciful and forgiving beyond all human comprehension. It is the sinner himself who refuses to be reconciled to God. The great Jehovah pleads with man to be reconciled, and with open arms is ready and more than willing to receive the returning prodigal. We are warranted, from express declarations of Scripture, in believing that the tenderest affections "of all in this nation, of all on the globe, brought together and made into one vast ocean, would be but a speck in comparison with the depths of sympathy and compassion in God." Christ says: "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him."—Matthew vii, 11.

"No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him."—John vi, 44. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." John vi, 37.

Now we know when we come to Christ. If we are sincerely sorry on account of our sins, and apply to him for pardon, we know it just as well as the nobleman of Capernaum knew when he applied to him to heal his son. Well, he tells us that no man can come to him unless influenced (drawn) by "the Father" to do so. We are altogether sinful, and of ourselves can do nothing good. Can we believe that a being so infinitely merciful as God is represented, would "draw" us toward himself, imparting to us earnest longings after good, and then leave us to perish? Such a thought is abhorrent to our ideas of even ordinary justice. In connection with this, take the declaration of the blessed Savior that he will "in no wise" turn away a suppliant, and we have every encouragement to believe that our Lord means just what he says. Believing this in our hearts, we must believe that we are justified. If we refuse to believe it we are without excuse. Let us, then, take up our Christian duties and go forward, without doubting, in the performance of them, exemplifying our faith in our lives. St. James says: "I will show thee my faith by my works."

We are taught in the sacred writings that the great Father above, in his dealings with poor, erring mortals, is infinitely more tender than the best earthly father can possibly be. Well, what earthly father, with a true father's heart, could turn a deaf ear to the pleadings of his child for forgiveness, no matter how aggravated its sin? Neither will God turn away from us when we go to him, sin-weary, and plead for mercy. He tells us so.

Then we must believe that, although he loves to see, on the part of the sinner, deep sorrow for sin—and the true believer, even after justification, will always, while in the flesh, grieve that he has ever sinned against so compassionate a Creator—yet he seeks the good of the creature in his reformation; and he absolutely requires only that amount of sorrow for sin which will induce man to abandon it, and that amount of faith which will induce man to take his bare word, and rely implicitly upon his promises as those of a kind father, independent of any peculiar manifestation or feeling. We are saved by faith, not by feeling.

It may be objected here—inasmuch as St. Paul declares: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God"—that the believer, although he may have a firm and abiding confidence in God, yet unless he have imparted to him a sense of perfect peace his faith is not genuine, and he cannot be justified; for remember that justification is bound to follow true repentance and true faith, or we make God untrue.

Now let us examine this expression of Paul's a little. What is the peace here expressed? We do not pretend to deny that, in some cases, it is doubtless a perfect feeling of placidity and holy joy "which passeth all understanding," sometimes amounting to rapture. But is it necessarily so in all cases? Not at all. Peace, in one sense, expresses a state or condition—an absence of war. The sinner before this has been in open rebellion, in a state of war against God; but when he grounds his arms he is no longer at war. He believes God's word implicitly, and determines to submit himself entirely to his will and guidance. He contends no longer. He is at peace. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

We repeat, we are saved by faith, not by feeling. Oh! that men would think more of the amazing love of God in Christ, and encourage the poor sin-burdened and doubting soul to believe that he has only to take Christ at his word, and rely implicitly upon what he says, and he is saved! This is the plan our Lord himself pursued. He received even an imperfect faith when he perceived the applicant's earnest desire. "And Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth; and straightway the father of the child cried out and said, with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief!"—Mark ix, 23 and 24. As much as if he had said: "I believe, and if it is not perfect believing, Lord, help the imperfection." His prayer was answered in two senses. Not only was his child healed, but no doubt his faith, wavering before, was confirmed and made strong. Oh, what a merciful Savior!

Finally, we are to become as little children. Now take the case of a child here. He has done wrong and he feels it, and, thus feeling, he goes to his father, in sorrow and real contrition, and sues for pardon. Suppose that father should avert his face and withhold his forgiveness, and treat the little applicant with coldness and indifference. What would be the effect? Would it not tend to harden the child in sin? It certainly would. Such conduct we would unhesitatingly pronounce cruel in man. How much more so in God, could we possibly conceive him capable of such action. Much more so, we say, because the man might consider his uncertainty regarding his child's sincerity a sufficient plea for his conduct; whereas "the Lord seeth not as man seeth, for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." He knows the heart to be broken and contrite, and "a broken and contrite heart he will not despise." But let the child receive the father's pardon gratefully and freely given, and his little heart is made happy, he goes on his way singing and rejoicing, and is encouraged to do better in the future, to do all he can to please the parent who has acted thus tenderly and lovingly toward him. Thus our Father in heaven acts toward us—only with a tenderness and a love so far transcending that of the very best of earthly fathers that the human mind can form no conception of its depth, its vastness, its comprehensiveness.

Let the seeker after righteousness reflect upon this marvelous love of God. Then let him come to understand the exceeding simplicity and beauty of the scriptural idea of faith, let him take it into his very heart and soul, and he stands firm as upon a rock, his doubts vanish, he feels that the smiles of his benign Master bless and cheer him, and he is enabled to go forward confidently as a good soldier, relying with an unshaken trust upon the strong arm of him "who is mighty and able to save to the uttermost" all who come unto him; whereas the man who is all the time looking for some particular feeling or some manifestation of some sort—he knows not what—and refuses to be comforted without it, goes doubting and halting, and in most instances is in sadness and gloom continually.

Much more might be said on this subject, and many passages might be brought forward from the Bible, in addition to those already quoted, to strengthen our position; but we will not trespass upon your columns too far.

We have said enough, we hope, to afford some little light to others, struggling as we did for years, to find out what constitutes Christian faith; and if what we have said should induce one or more doubting, sin-stricken souls to cast themselves upon the infinite mercy of God through Christ, and, believing his bare word, accept the salvation which he so freely offers them, we will have accomplished our object in writing this article, and feel that we have been abundantly repaid.

In conclusion, let us remember that although it is an easy matter to become Christians, our warfare with the powers of darkness will have then just commenced. The Christian life is one of self-denial. We will be beset on all sides by temptations. Let us remember that we cannot perform truly and well the duties of a single day without God's help. Let us take the blessed Savior as our model. To be real Christians we must be Christ-like. Let us bear in mind the promise of our Master: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

CARROLL PARISH, Louisiana.

District Stewards.

MR. EDITOR: The duties of district stewards are clearly defined in our Discipline. There the question is asked: "What are the duties of a district steward? Answer. To attend the district stewards' meeting for the purpose of estimating the salary and traveling expenses of the presiding elder, and to apportion the amount among the several charges in the district, and to report the same to his Quarterly Conference."—See Discipline, page 100. On page 145 it is expressly stated that "the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders shall be estimated by the district stewards." "The district stewards shall apportion the amount allowed among the different pastoral charges of the district, whose boards of stewards (circuit and station stewards) shall add the sum thus apportioned to the amounts agreed on by them (circuit and station stewards) to be raised for their preachers (circuit and station preachers,) and its collection shall be provided for in the same way."

Now this is plain and easy to be understood. When district stewards have assessed the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders, and have apportioned the amount to be raised by each circuit and station on their districts for their support, and have reported the same to their Quarterly Conferences, to be recorded in their journals, they have discharged the whole of their official duty as district stewards. After this is done by them, the circuit and station stewards on the district are to add the amount assessed by the board of district stewards, for the support of the presiding elders, to the salary assessed by them for the support of their preachers. After all this is done, circuit and station stewards are legally bound by the law of our church to collect both the salary of the presiding elders and the salary of their preachers together, "in the same way." But they are not bound to take up any collection for the presiding elder until this is done, because until this is done, by the board of district stewards, circuit and station stewards have nothing at all to do with the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders. None but district stewards can legally assess the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders. Quarterly Conferences cannot legally do this. Circuit, station and recording stewards cannot do this, because it is the work assigned to the office of district stewards in our Discipline, and to none else. They are the presiding elders' stewards, appointed by law to assess his salary and traveling expenses, and if they neglect to do it it cannot be legally done. It is very true that assessments are made at this time for presiding elders, by circuit stewards and station stewards, under the advisement of presiding elders in Quarterly Conferences; but this is illegal—it is an innovation on the Discipline of our church—and therefore no Methodist is bound to abide by it.

Now, sir, if presiding elders do such things as this with impunity, regardless of our church code of laws, what will our church members do? I believe in presiding elders for two reasons: First, Some of them I believe to be great and good men. Second, I cannot see how our church could do well without them. And yet at the same time I believe they all ought to be law-abiding men in their official acts of administration. If it be said here, by way of justification for this practical innovation on our Book of Discipline, that the district stewards will not hold meetings in order to estimate the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders, and therefore we are compelled to have it done by circuit and station stewards, or not have it done at all—to this we reply: First. If this is done by circuit and station stewards of the district, according to our Discipline it is not done at all. Second. If this be correct, we have no use at all for district stewards as an official body in our church, and therefore our late General Conference ought to have taken from them their stewardship by demolishing their office forever. Third. District stewards are amenable to our Quarterly Conferences for their official conduct.—See Discipline, page 99. There the question is asked: "To whom are the stewards accountable for the faithful performance of their duties? Answer. To the Quarterly Conference, which shall have the power to remove them from office." Well, sir, if district stewards will not assess the salary and traveling expenses of presiding elders, as this case of necessity for this innovation assumes, why are they not reported to the Quarterly Conference for the neglect of their official duty and removed from office, and others elected in their place that will do their duty? This the Quarterly Conference has power to do. Why is it not done? This would put a final stop to this necessitous case of innovation.

Again, if it be said, by way of justification for this innovation on our Discipline, that it is an established usage among presiding elders to do this, and therefore it is legal and right—to this we answer that no usage is legal and right in the Methodist Church that ignores the Discipline of our church and destroys one of the official branches thereof. This usage adopted by some of our presiding elders does this by having their salary and traveling expenses assessed by circuit and station stewards in their Quarterly Conferences, when our Discipline expressly says that district stewards "shall do this."

Again, this usage adopted by some presiding elders destroys our official board of district stewards by taking from them all the official work assigned them, as official officers of the church, and turning it over into the hands of circuit and station stewards, and leaving their own district stewards no official work to do. It is no wonder to me, sir, that district stewards disregard the call of presiding elders to hold a district stewards' meeting in order to assess their salary and traveling expenses after being thus treated by them. Whoean blame them for this neglect of duty?

DISCIPLINARIAN.

Marianna District Conference.

MR. EDITOR: The Marianna District Conference of the Alabama Annual Conference held its eighth session at Marianna, Florida, June 25-27, 1874.

The nine pastors of the district were all present, together with some local preachers, and there were more delegates in attendance than usual.

A letter from Bishop Pierce, written in January, with regard to holding our Conference earlier, was not received in time for us to avail ourselves of his valuable services. We were kindly presided over by our presiding elder, Bro. M. E. Butt.

Verbal reports were made as to the spiritual state of the church, showing improvement as a general thing, though in one or two instances the reports were not encouraging.

The subject of temperance was brought up for consideration, and the information obtained indicated the progress of sound views with respect to this important matter, and showed some improvement in practice. While upon this subject there was an interchange of views as to the proper kind of wine to be used in administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and the sentiment of the Conference was clearly in favor of the juice of the grape in preference to any other kind of wine, and clearly against the use of the noxious compounds sometimes, it may be oftentimes, obtained at groceries.

Family prayer was reported to be held in a moderately fair number of families. There seems to have been improvement in this respect, and room for much more.

A goodly number were found to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Church Conferences and class meetings do not seem to prosper.

Forty adults and fifty-seven infants were reported to have been baptized.

Thirty-six Sunday schools were reported, with one hundred and sixty-two teachers and nine hundred and three scholars.

Some small amounts had been collected for missions. The presiding elder stated that there was much missionary ground in the district, the difficulty being to find men for that kind of work. There is also the well-known difficulty of supporting preachers thus employed.

The statistical reports showed that but meager sums had been paid the pastors and presiding elder. Much allowance should be made for this on account of the short crops of last year, and the generally moderate circumstances of the people over a large portion of the district.

The Conference resolved to continue the efforts commenced last year to establish a high school within the district.

A communication was presented by the district stewards, informing the Conference of their conclusion to make an effort to purchase a house in Marianna for a district parsonage, and of the appointment of agents, residing in and near Marianna, to carry out the wishes of the stewards.

The Conference holds its next session at Ozark, Alabama.

Our religious services were continued until Sunday night, July 5. There were fourteen applicants for membership—twelve to be received here and two at other places. Of the eleven already received into full connection here, eight are Sunday-school scholars. The church has been revived, and for this and for the ingathering of souls we are thankful.

Scotland High School.

MR. EDITOR: The closing exercises of the Scotland High School took place at Dowdville, Neshoba county, Mississippi, June 26, 1874.

The examination was highly commendable, both to teachers and pupils. We were highly pleased with the prompt manner in which most of the pupils answered the questions propounded to them, and we were perfectly delighted with the mode of teaching adopted by Prof. Dominick and his assistants, who seemed determined to have their pupils thoroughly understand their studies. The patrons were well pleased with the progress of their sons and daughters; even spectators, who were close observers, had much to say of the progress of the children. Too much cannot be said for Prof. Dominick and his accomplished lady, who have been untiring in their work. The examination closed at four o'clock P. M., and then essays were read by several young ladies of the school. The Rev. J. B. K. Smith was then introduced as orator for the occasion, who said many good things about education. A large number of pupils were read out as distinguished in their studies during the past session. The exercises closed by the benediction. At night a large crowd met to witness the concert given by Mrs. Smith.

The school is under the supervision of the Brandon district, Mississippi Conference. It will begin its third term on the first of next September, and we would say to all who wish their children educated: Inquire of the Scotland school. The inducements are good. It is a healthy location. Moral influences are great. Tuition is very reasonable. Board cheap—only $10 per month, exclusive of washing, lights, etc., strictly in advance. Satisfactory arrangements can be made as to board and tuition.

TRUSTEE.

AN ATHEIST'S FUNERAL.—Under the title of "An Atheist's Funeral" the London Sun publishes an account of the burial of Mr. Austin Holyoake, who died in the full faith of negation, and passed his last hours in drawing up an assertion of his continued disbelief in the existence of God. It is an astonishingly calm and sturdy statement, and referring to his own terrible sufferings and the tendency of most skeptics to renounce their unbelief at the approach of death he says: "They who, under pain, say they see the error of their previous belief, had never thought out the problem for themselves." Funeral orations were pronounced over his grave by Messrs. Watts and Bradlaugh. Both shrank instinctively from the assertion of their own gloomy beliefs, and could not, over the grave of their friend, give utterance to their conviction that he was nothing but dust. Even on his tombstone there was an inscription under which the most devoted Christian might rest, and before which his loving friends might kneel in joyful trust: "In memoriam. Gone before."

LET THE winds and the waves of adversity blow and dash around you, if they will; but keep on the path of rectitude, and you will be as firm as a rock. Plant yourself upon principle, and bid defiance to misfortune. If gossip, with her poisoned tongue, meddles with your good name, heed her not. Carry yourself erect; let your course be straightforward, and by the serenity of your countenance and the purity of your life, give the lie to all who would underrate and belittle you.

THE softest road is not always the best road. It is on the smooth ice we slip; a rough path is usually safer for our feet.

Obituaries.

DIED, near Grand Gulf, Mississippi, on the thirtieth of June, Mr. JOHN R. HARRING, aged about thirty-eight years.

He was a man of more than ordinary mind, over fond of social life. His ardent temperament and warm social feelings sometimes led him into excesses, but he possessed many noble traits of character—such traits as enter into the character of every gentleman. For several years previous to his death he was engaged in the mercantile business; but he was too liberal and confiding ever to succeed in business. He was not a member of any church, but for several years prior to his death he was a constant attendant at church, and always contributed of his substance to all the enterprises of the church whenever called upon so to do, and always seemed delighted to have the company of ministers of the gospel at his home. He seemed to have a high appreciation of the gospel, though he never embraced it in its saving power. He often expressed his unbounded confidence in the religion of his pious wife, and wished to be as good as she was. He has left her to fight the great battle of life alone, with five little children to care for. May she trust in God, who has promised to take care of her and her children. D. A. J. PARKER.

SHE has fallen asleep in Jesus—one of "the beloved"—MARY E. HENDRIXON, on the first of July, in the thirty-second year of her age.

"During the hours of sickness and pain her light was serene and steadfast. Her calm resignation and perfect trust were beautiful and comforting. The frequent admonition to her loved ones was: "Trust in the Lord and all will be well." She left us with a smile, for God smiled upon her. Many years ago, at the age of ten, she gave her heart unto holy things, became a child of God, and has truly and zealously walked in his ways all the days of her life. Her pathway, "glorified by grace," will shine "more and more unto the perfect day."

She leaves to mourn her loss a fond husband, three dear children, parents, brothers, sisters and a numerous circle of devoted friends. Few enjoyed more unexceptional popularity. In the bosom of her immediate family the most tender; in the church earnest, sincere, without reproach; among neighbors and acquaintances kind and genial. While thus contemplating "the footsteps that she trod" I can but exclaim: She is not dead, but sleeping—resting after her holy labors in the service of her God, reaping the rich reward promised to the faithful. Her bright example, her pure influence will be felt till time shall be no more. And can she die? Nay; "He giveth his beloved sleep."

A FRIEND.

MR. BENJAMIN MURRELL, of Morehouse parish, Louisiana, died at the residence of the late R. J. Knox, on Bayou Bartholomew, on the twenty-fourth of May, A. D. 1874, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Bro. Murrell has been for many years a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to whose doctrines and communion he was peculiarly attached. He was one of those pleasant, quiet men who make but little outward demonstration of his religion, except that he was ready to do all he could for the promotion of the cause of Christ. He was peculiarly fond of religious conversation, and enjoyed preaching—seemingly more than most men, there being a pleasant smile upon his countenance, indicating the state of peace and sunshine that reigned within. He was for years a member of the board of stewards, and was one of that number whose labor and liberality were calculated to provoke others to good works. He possessed the "Macedonian grace" above the "ability to perform," and in this, "though dead, he yet speaketh." His last illness was short—only about forty minutes. On his way from church with his family, after crossing the bayou in a boat, he was slightly kicked by a horse, no one thinking it would prove fatal until too late to revive the flickering taper of life, which was fast waning. He leaves a wife and three children to mourn their loss, and a large circle of friends and acquaintances throughout the parish, who remember his many acts of kindness and benevolence, and drop with them involuntarily the tear of sorrow.

T. H. MCCLENDON, Pastor.

ALFRED HUDSON, the subject of this memoir, was born in North Carolina, September 1, 1801, and died in Newton county, Mississippi, March 21, 1874. He was married to Miss Mary J. Johnson, daughter of Rev. Solomon and Sarah Johnson, of Sampson county, North Carolina, December 15, 1825. He joined the Methodist Church in 1827, and lived an acceptable member till death. He served as class-leader a great part of his long connection with the church.

He moved from Alabama to this State in 1872. At the time of his death he was living in Neshoba county, Mississippi. He started in the morning to a neighboring store to get some provisions, and called at Mr. R. Green's, in Newton county. He had been subject to spells for about two years—supposed to be heart disease—and complained of having one of these spells. He was seated in the yard, where several of his friends chanced to be, and was engaged in conversation. When death struck him he was carried into the house, but breathed only a few times. Though passing away so suddenly, he left us not without hope and the witness of a better life beyond this vale of tears. He fell by the way without a groan or struggle; but we feel safe in saying that his spirit ascended on high. Since the war he belonged to the Northern branch of the church. He lived to raise thirteen children. One died in the army. All the rest lived till last year, when one son (a preacher,) two daughters and three grandchildren died. The balance of his children, as far as I know, are members of the church. May his aged companion and children and many relatives meet him in glory. His funeral was preached by Rev. L. P. Mealor to a large, attentive and weeping congregation. D. L. MILLER.

THE subject of this notice belonged to that class of whom it may be said: "Full many a flower is born to bloom unseen."

Mrs. ANN BRANTLEY departed this life at Hampden, Marengo county, Alabama, on the first of March, 1874, while upon a visit to friends. She was the child of pious parents. Mr. Nathaniel Kimbrough and his wife (of blessed memory,) late of Wilcox county, Alabama, reared all their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. To this was added useful lessons in household duties. Thus was Sister Brantley prepared to be a helpmate for Mr. J. S. Brantley, to whom she was married in early life. According to the faith of her parents, she attached herself to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and lived and died a faithful member.

For a number of years before she died she was the daughter of affliction, and suffered much; but under the visitation her faith failed not. She knew in whom she had trusted, and that his promises were sure and steadfast. The writer knew her long and well, and can say that he has no recollection of having ever seen a frown upon her face or heard a murmur from her lips. She was worthy of the application of the poet's lines, and fully possessed

"A heart resigned, submissive, meek;
Her great Redeemer's throne,
Where only Christ was heard to speak,
Where Jesus reigned alone."

If she had an enemy I know it not, and all who knew her loved her much. She died as she lived, and as if passing into a sweet sleep she went to that place where the weary are forever at rest, leaving a husband, a daughter (an only child) and other relatives to mourn their loss. To them I would say: You know how she lived, you have seen how she died. "Go thou and do likewise."

T. W. MATHEWS.

FOR some years past there has been numbered among the youth of this his native parish, one of rare excellence of character, whom we shall no more see in this world. Endowed by nature with unusually fine and comely appearance, and blessed with the advantages of fine social culture, he had carried up to youthful manhood the simplicity and guilelessness of childhood. Having been of an energetic character, both mental and physical, he had extended the sphere of his acquaintance quite beyond the immediate neighborhood of his own vicinity, and embraced in the circle of his friends of this his native and of adjoining parishes. Esteemed and appreciated by all who knew him, he was especially an object of hope and of joy to a fond mother, and the bright expectation of a most indulgent father. Reared in a beloved and excellent family, where the law of kindness and of truth, of parental reverence and filial affection, of paternal love and kindness, is the law of life, where charity, heaven born charity, rules, and a most generous Christian and refined hospitality keeps faithful vigils at every door, he might justly have been pronounced a model son, a model brother, a model social companion and friend. But, alas!

"While life was in its spring,
And youthful hope just waved her joyous wing,
The spoiler came, and all that promise fair
Has sought the grave, to sleep in silence there."

Reared in the school and culture of Christ, in a family where the lessons of divine wisdom are taught alike by precept and example, he possessed many of the virtues and excellencies which adorn the Christian character, without having made a profession of religion or personal piety until near the close of a long, wasting, lingering and at times most painful affliction. The doctrines of Jesus Christ, of the resurrection of the dead, of life and immortality beyond the grave through a crucified Redeemer, he had known from childhood; and, having been blessed with a full possession of his mental faculties up to his last moments, and guided by the counsels and sustained by the prayers of the righteous, he was cheered in his entrance into the dark valley of the shadow of death with the light of eternity, with hopes full of immortality, realizing by anticipation, at least, the presence and union with his sainted sister, for years past an inhabitant of the kingdom of God. Of this excellent, amiable and beloved youth it may therefore be truly said that

Death had no terrors, the grave had no gloom
To the spirit departing for its heavenly home.
No longer to suffer, thou art freed from all pain,
And the arms that embraced thee shall embrace thee again.

And thus his venerated and patriarchal father, Rev. Thomas Clinton, and his honored mother, Mrs. Anna Clinton—whose children rise up and call her blessed—have to mourn, "not without hope," the departure from this life, in the morning of his days, their youthful, their youngest son, their beloved BENJAMIN, who died at his parental home, in this parish, on the twenty-third of February last, in the twenty-fourth year of his age.

So fades the summer cloud away,
So sinks the gale when storms are o'er,
So shuts the closing eye of day,
So dies the wave along the shore.

OAK LAWN, St. Helena Parish, May 2, 1874.

PIUS THE NINTH, despite the affection that is entertained for him by many of the Romans, is still believed to have "the evil eye"—to be a Jettatore, which means that merely to be stared at by him brings one bad luck. He blessed Italy in 1848, and Italy went to ruin. He excommunicated Italy in 1859, and things have gone right ever since. Besides these great examples of jettatura, people tell of men having had their legs broken just after receiving the Pope's benediction. The very women who used to kneel to him in the streets, as he passed, were accustomed to make a certain sign with their hand—a sign which, according to tradition, destroyed the influence of the jettatura.—*N. TWILIGHT.

Twilight's tranquil hour!
Spirit, pressed with care,
Here, in peaceful bower
Kneeling, breathe thy prayer.

Nature's hour of prayer—
Work to worship swell;
Whispereth the air
Like the voice of God.

Grief hath found a tear,
Penitence a prayer.
Heaven now seems more near—
Fades each earthly care.

The Comet.

Prof. Holden, of the Washington Observatory, says that the matter, the solid substance composing comets, is exceedingly small and light. To such an extent is this true that they pass near planets without disturbing them. To illustrate: The comet of 1770, in its sweeping and terrible advance upon the sun, got intertwined, mixed up with the satellites of Jupiter, and could not get away for nearly four months, but this had no sensible effect upon them. That same comet came within 1,400,000 miles of the earth. Now, if its quantity had been equal to the earth, it would, by the power of attraction, have caused the earth to revolve in an orbit much larger than its present and real one, and thereby adding hours to the length of our day.

The idea that danger can happen to our earth from comets is an absurd one. Even admitting that the matter of comets is solid, astronomers have abundant reasons for this belief.

The remarkable comets of the present century are the comets of 1864, 1862, 1861, 1860, 1858, 1843 and 1811. That of 1864 was very remarkable for the tremendous size of its head. That of 1862 was distinguished for its great number of luminous jets and ever-changing emanations. That of 1861 created a profound sensation. With the possible exception of Venus, its light surpassed that of any fixed star or planet, and when, on the thirtieth of June, a portion of the earth encountered the effects of its tail, a yellow, phosphorescent glare obscured even the light of the sun.

That of 1858 was Donati's great discovery. In June of that year he saw its first traces—a gauze-like nebulosity advancing north and near the star Leonis, distant from the earth 240,000,000 of miles. August 20 its tail was first seen, and August 29 it began to be perceptible to the naked eye, and by September 17 its head was equal to a star of the second magnitude, and its tail spread out to a length of 50,000,000 of miles.

That of 1843 was one of the very finest of all the century, and was perhaps the most impressive in its effects. On the cold, clear nights of the first of winter it shone out with amazing splendor, even reflecting a yellow sheen upon the snow. It is probable that this comet did much to revive superstition concerning them. Mr. Miller, the head of the Church of the Second Adventists, had prophesied the destruction of the world and the second coming of Christ about this time, and his followers all believed the presence of the comet truly indicated the near approach of the final judgment day. If the chroniclers of that time are to be believed, those who expected to be caught up in the air to meet their coming Lord used to put on white ascension robes, go out on the tops of their houses and wait in the cold all night.

The comet of 1811, all things considered, perhaps the most celebrated one of modern times, was periodic in its character, and has an orbit of 3,065 years. It shone with terrific splendor for many weeks.

Prof. Holden, on being asked what would be the nearest approach of Coggia's comet to the sun, said: "Its perihelion distance will be just inside the orbit of Venus, and occurs to-day (the eighth.) It is in the vicinage of 62,000,000 of miles, and this, too, is also the time of its greatest brightness, extending perhaps to the fourteenth. It will arrive at perigee (nearest the earth) July 20, at a distance of 26,000,000 of miles."

"What is the earth's mean distance from the sun?"

"We assume it now to be 92,000,000 of miles. However, on this point astronomers are not agreed."

"Do the laws of gravitation determine the pathway of a comet?"

"Entirely so."

"Is a comet under absolute control like the planets?"

"Certainly."

"Is it probable that the earth will be enveloped in the tail of this comet?"

"There is not the slightest probability of it."

"What would be the effect of such an incident?"

"The only effect would be the production of a meteoric shower."

"How is the tail formed?"

"The motion of this comet is many millions of miles per day. As it moves through space particles of matter are thrown off from its head, and these constitute the luminous train called the tail. The head of this comet is probably solid. That of many others is mostly gas. The tail is always gaseous."

"Would a meteoric display occur if its matter were not solid?"

"Yes; either way, whether it is solid or gaseous."

"What would be the effect upon the earth if the solid head of the comet should strike it?"

"It would be had for the comet. It would be scattered in meteoric stones."

"Has the earth ever been struck by a comet?"

"Probably not: Biela's comet may have been the cause of the shooting stars spoken of in Prof. Parkhurst's letter to the Tribune, but it is not certain. Most likely Prof. Pogson would not see Biela near Theta Centauri."

"What are the elements of this comet?"

"You may rely upon it that they do not agree with any of which we have record. Probably it has never been seen by human eye before, and will hardly be again; but from it, with the aids of advanced science, we shall gain more specific knowledge of comets than the world has ever had."

From the rich sources of information at the National Observatory other items of deep interest to all intelligent readers were obtained. For instance, the following are the real diameters in English miles of the nuclei of some comets satisfactorily measured during the last one hundred years:

Comet of 1845, diameter, 8,000 miles.
Donati's of 1858, diameter, 5,600 miles.
Comet of 1805, diameter, 5,300 miles.
Comet of 1811, diameter, 428 miles.

LENGTH OF TAILS.

Comet of 1744, length of tail, 19,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1860, length of tail, 22,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1861, length of tail, 24,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1769, length of tail, 40,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1858, length of tail, 42,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1618, length of tail, 50,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1680, length of tail, 100,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1811, length of tail, 100,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1843, length of tail, 200,000,000 miles.
Comet of 1874, length of tail, undetermined.

The cometary orbit of the comet of 1729 is the greatest ever known, and is 383,800,000 of miles, perihelion distance; the smallest ever known is the cometary orbit of the comet of 1843, which was 538,000 of miles, perihelion distance. The comet of 1844, the greatest orbit ever known in aphelion distance, is 406,130,000,000 miles; the comet of Encke, least orbit ever known in aphelion distance, 388,550,000.

From the earliest period up to the present time about 800 comets have a trustworthy record and history. Within the last one hundred years optical instruments, made available in seeking them, have disclosed the existence of four or five thousand such wanderers.

Comets remain visible varying from a few days to more than a year, but the usual time is two or three months. These are some which have remained longest in sight: The comet of 1811, seventeen months; of 1825, twelve months; of 1835, nine and a half months; of 1847, nine and a half months; of 1858, nine months; of 1844, eight months; of 1847, eight months.

John Leland's Ordination.

It is reported that Leland was at first ordained a minister by the choice of the church, without the imposition of the hands of the presbytery. He continued for some years afterward to preach and to baptize on the authority of his simple appointment, much to the disturbance of the peace of the association to which he belonged. In fact, on account of his departure from the usages of the churches in Virginia, he was not for awhile in good fellowship with any. Whether right or wrong, he openly professed to believe that the imposition of hands by the apostles in ancient times was only to confer miraculous gifts, and that consequently such a ceremony in the church now was in itself worthless, because wholly unauthorized. His brethren urged him most earnestly, for the sake of peace, to submit to ordination by the hands of the ministry; and finally, to gratify them, he consented that they might call a presbytery for that purpose. Knowing all the questions which they would ask on his examination, and resolved in his own mind on the answers he would give, he felt confident that they would not ordain him.

The council, consisting of three staunch Calvinists, was called. The day appointed for the ordination arrived, and with it came a multitude of people to witness the ceremony. The work was divided among the several presbyters. One was to ask the usual questions concerning his faith and call; another was to offer up an ordination prayer; and the other was to deliver the charge to the pastor and the church. Leland took his seat long before they appeared, and, resting his arms on his knees, and burying his face in his hands, awaited their movements. The presbyter appointed to conduct the examination at length began:

"Bro. Leland, it becomes my duty, according to previous arrangement, to ask you a few questions upon the subject of your faith, and in reference to your call to the ministry."

"Well, brother," said Leland, slowly raising his head, "I will tell you all I know," and down went his head into his hands again.

Moderator—"Bro. Leland, do you not believe that God chose his people in Christ before the foundation of the world?"

Leland (looking up)—"I know not, brother, what God was doing before he began to make this world."

Moderator—"Bro. Leland, do you not believe that God had a people from before the foundation of the world?"

Leland—"If he had, brother, they were not our kind of folks. Our people were made out of dust, you know, and before the foundation of the world there was no dust to make them out of."

"You believe, Bro. Leland, that all men are totally depraved?"

Leland—"No, brother. If they were they could not wax worse and worse, as some of them do. The devil was no worse than totally depraved."

"Well, there are other questions that will embrace all these in substance. I will ask whether you do not believe that sinners are justified by the righteousness of Christ imputed to them?"

Leland—"Yes, brother, provided they will do right themselves; but I know of no righteousness that will justify a man that won't do right himself."

"Bro. Leland, I will ask you one more question. Do you believe that all the saints will persevere through grace to glory and get home to heaven at last?"

Leland—"I can tell you more about that, my brother, when I get there myself. Some seem to make a very bad start of it here."

The presbyter, seeing that the audience was greatly amused, proposed to his colleagues that they should retire for a few moments and consult together. After returning they remarked to the congregation that Bro. Leland had not answered the questions as satisfactorily as they could wish, but they all knew that he had many eccentricities for which they should make every allowance; that they had concluded accordingly to ask him a few questions touching his call to the ministry.

Moderator—"Bro. Leland, you believe that God has called you to preach the gospel?"

Leland—"I never heard him, brother."

"We do not suppose, Bro. Leland, that you ever heard an audible voice, but you know what we mean."

Leland—"But wouldn't it be a queer call, brother, if there were no voice and nothing said?"

Moderator (evidently confused)—"Well, well, Bro. Leland, you believe, at least, that it is your duty to preach the gospel to every creature?"

Leland—"Ah! no, my brother. I do not believe it to be my duty to preach to the Dutch, for instance, for I can't do it. When the Lord sent the apostles to preach to every nation he taught them to talk to all sorts of people; but he has never taught me to talk Dutch yet."

"But, Bro. Leland, you feel a great desire for the salvation of sinners, do you not?"

Leland—"Sometimes I think I do; and then again I don't care if the devil gets the whole of them."

Upon this the council retired again, and reported as before, much to the surprise of Leland, who was constrained to submit to ordination. After they had ordained him in due form he said:

"Well, brethren, when Peter put his hands on people and took them off they had more sense than they had before; but you have all had your hands on my head, and, before God, I am as big a fool now as I was before you put them on."—The Baptist Weekly.

The No-Mind Family.

Some people have no mind; they take all ideas from others; they are fond of sign-posts and are guided by them. The fast strong mind they meet always gives theirs a tint. They follow any folks who will give sentiments of their own, without thinking at all whether they are blind guides or bona fide leaders, and so frequently form erroneous ideas. I just wish that every one who cannot give an opinion of his own, without requiring support from others, could be obliged to pay a tax.

I remember once having a piece of advice. Now, pray, don't, don't, don't think that was the only piece I was ever favored with. By no means; indeed, nearly everybody with whom I come into contact seems to consider me a "fit and proper" subject for advice. (Note, I don't always take it.) Well, this particular advice was given to me very impressively—to be sure and never, on any account whatever, marry a man with too much backbone, who could not do anything which touched his pride. But I say seriously that I would a great deal sooner marry that kind of a man than one who has not any backbone at all, and sneaks out of everything.

You ask a man of that sort a question about a candidate for Congress, and he replies:

"Oh, I was talking to Mr. Fore thought a few minutes ago, and he thinks his opinions are a great deal too much advanced for this town."

"But what do you think?"

"Well—really—now—I don't know, I'm sure."

They have one set of phrases; you never need expect any more from the families of "no-minds;" they either "don't know" or they quote somebody else.

"Good-morning, Miss Sharpe; you are looking quite fresh, out so early. What do you think of our new minister's sermon yesterday?"

"Well, I have just left Miss A., only a minute or two in fact, and she says she is sure he does not believe in the atonement."

"But what do you think?"

"Well"—this with a deprecatory smile—"I am not much of a judge."

"Have you been introduced to his wife?"

"What is your opinion of her?"

"Why Mrs. B. says she considers her proud, and not at all what a minister's wife ought to be."

And so if you kept on talking for a month (excuse the absurdity of the proposition) you would not get an original thought. They are a large family, these "no-minds;" and just live, day after day, and seem to be born for no earthly purpose but to fill up a few gaps—and talk.—Christian at Work.

THE BEST KING.—At a missionary meeting on the Island of Raratonga, one of the Harvey group in the Pacific ocean, an old man said: "I have lived during the reign of four kings; in the first we were continually at war, and a fearful season it was—watching and hiding in fear took up all our thoughts. During the reign of the second we were overtaken with a severe famine, and all expected to perish; then we ate rats and grass, and this wood and that wood. During the third we were conquered, and became the spoil and prey of the people in the two other parts of the island; then if a man went to fish he rarely ever returned, or if a woman went any distance to fetch food she was seldom ever seen again. But during the reign of this third king we were visited by another King, a great King, a good King, a King of love—Jesus the Lord from heaven. He has gained the victory, he has conquered our hearts; therefore we now have peace and plenty in this world, and hope soon to dwell with him in heaven."

SOMETIME.

There is a ship named Sometime;
Men dream of it, and wait,
One on the shore, impatient,
And one at the household gate,
Thinking: "If it come not in the morn,
Then in the evening it may."
But one I know, not thinking of ships,
Worked to the close of the day;
Lifting his eyes at the evening-time,
Lo! there his ship at anchor lay.

Proper Names.

In New England the frequency of names which may be regarded as Puritanic was somewhat greater in the second and third generation of colonists than in the first; but the proportion of such names to the whole number of inhabitants has never exceeded one-tenth. One-half of the graduates of Harvard College from 1642 to 1700 bore one or another of the five names, John, Samuel, Thomas, Joseph and Nathaniel. From 1700 to 1726 these five names represent only about two-fifths of the whole number, and the Williams and Ebenezers must be added to make up the half. For the whole period from 1642 to 1726 the name of Benjamin stands seventh, displacing Ebenezer. One-half the graduates of Oxford University, for nearly the same period (1659 to 1726) were named John, Thomas or William, and half of the others were Richards, Georges, Roberts and Henrys. Charles was a very uncommon name in New England before the middle of the last century. "The man of blood" and "the merry monarch" had brought it into disrepute. The Harvard catalogue shows only five Charleses in the first hundred years, and three of these were Chanceys, who traced their pedigree in a female line back through Charles the Simple and Charles the Bold to Charlemagne. Yale graduated only one Charles before 1757. * * * * *

Hutchinson, in his "History of Massachusetts," says that "the three first that were baptized in a Boston church were Joy, Recompense and Pity." These belong to a class of names which were once popular in New England, though less common in Connecticut than in Massachusetts colony. Some of these names were admonitory—"Submit," "Take-heed," "Hold-fast," "Wait-still," "Mind-well," "Yet-once," etc. Some expressed the joy and gratitude of parents, or acknowledged a special mercy—as Thankful, Comfort, Recompense, Experience, Deliverance, Freeborn, etc. Some were borrowed from the graces (not the pagan Aglaia, Thalia and Euphrosyne, but the Christian)—Faith, Hope, Charity, Love; Grace, Mercy and Peace; Temperance, Prudence, Silence, Obedience, Desire. Occasionally the name commemorated an event of personal or colonial history. John Cotton's son, born on shipboard on the voyage to New England, was baptized "Seaborn." Richard Davenport, of Salem, named a daughter, born in the year in which his friend John Endecott cut the red cross from the English flag, "True-cross." Roger Clap, of Dorchester, who came over in 1630, named his first three children Samuel, William and Elizabeth; his next, a daughter, was called "Experience" (probably in memory of a passage in his religious life, of which he makes mention in his "Memoirs;") then came, in order Wait-still, Preserved (a second) Experience, Hope-still, Wait, Thanks, Desire, Thomas, Unite and Supply—and the last name was not inappropriate to the fourteenth child in a family. Several of these names were transmitted to descendants. The Rev. William Adams, of Dedham, noted in his diary that his son Eliphalet (afterward minister of New London) was "so named from the Lord's special preservation and deliverance of him and his mother from the danger they were both in at his birth" (the Hebrew name signifying "The Lord is deliverance.") In the autumn of 1679 the colonies abounded in thanksgiving for the discovery of the pretended "Popish Plot." Ebenezer and Jedediah Strong, of Northampton, each named a son, born in that year, Preserved, and their brother Thomas called his son Silah. Preserved Fish, son of Thomas, of Portsmouth, Rhode Island, born in 1679, has had namesakes, I believe, in every succeeding generation.—Hon. J. H. Trumbull, in the Independent.

THE WORD "CANARD."—The origin of the word canard (French for duck,) when used to signify some unfounded story, is not generally known. The following are the terms in which M. Guetelet relates, in the Annuaire de l'Academie, the manner in which the word became used in a new sense: "To give a sky lift at the ridiculous pieces of intelligence which the journals are in the habit of publishing every morning, Cornelison stated that an interesting experiment had just been calculated to prove the extraordinary voracity of ducks. Twenty of these animals had been placed together, and one of them having been killed and cut up into the smallest possible pieces, feathers and all, and thrown to the other nineteen, had been gluttonously gobbled up in an exceedingly short time.

"Another was taken from the nineteen, and, being chopped small like its predecessor, was served up to eighteen, and at once devoured like the other; and so on to the last who was thus placed in the position of having eaten his nineteen companions in a wonderfully short time. All this, most pleasantly narrated, obtained a success which the writer was far from anticipating, for the story ran the rounds of all the journals in Europe. It then became almost forgotten for about a score of years, when it came back from America, with amplifications which it did not boast of at the commencement, and with a regular certificate of the autopsy of the body of the surviving animal, whose œsophagus was declared to have been found seriously injured. Every one laughed at the history of the canard thus brought up again, but the word retains its novel significance."

WE should not retain the memory of faults we once have forgiven.

Religious Intelligence.

THE Jews of Nashville are about to invest $40,000 in a synagogue.

THE members of Dr. Swing's church, Chicago, propose to erect a tabernacle to seat three thousand, and cost about $100,000.

THE Old Catholic Synod of Bonn has abolished obligatory confession, but allows men to confess to their priest, if they choose to do so.

THE United Presbyterian mission in Egypt has nine stations. The total number of communicants is five hundred, and eight. The native Christians contributed $2,952.

THERE are said to be about 250,000 Friends in the United States, 12,000 of whom reside in New York city and Brooklyn, and worship in less than half a dozen meeting-houses.

THE Lord's Supper is administered every Sunday in about twelve hundred churches in England and Wales. Nearly three hundred of these are of the very High Church kind, in which candles are lighted in the day-time.

THE Unitarians of London complain that their churches in that city are dwindling, and threatening to die out. Four of the churches there are without pastors, and there is no immediate prospect that they will be supplied.

JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE is one of about fifty priests and deacons of the English Church who have relinquished holy orders between August 9, 1870, and July 4, 1873. He was a deacon, and relinquished the office in September, 1872.

A SPEAKER at a church extension meeting in New York stated that there is annually spent there for $3,000,000 for religious objects connected with the 470 churches and missions, while $7,000,000 are spent in theaters, $9,000,000 on newspapers, and $50,000,000 in the 8,403 drinking places.

THE Wesleyan Conference, while in session at Hamilton, Canada, was visited by the Methodist New Connection delegation. They were received with enthusiasm, and the Conference accepted the interpretation of the basis of union given by the New Connection Conference. This remains the only obstacle to union.

THE remains of Rev. John Summerfield, one of the pioneers sent to America by John Wesley, which have been buried in the vault of the Sands Street Methodist Episcopal church since 1826, are to be exhumed and sent to Mount Vernon for reinterment. A contemplated alteration in the church makes it necessary to remove the vault.

THE American Home Missionary Society received during last year $290,120, Presbyterian Board $207,151; the former sustained 969 missionaries, the latter 1,012. The Presbyterian Board was in debt $19,500, the American Home Missionary Society had in the treasury a balance of $4,723.16. The Presbyterians have organized 173 new churches, the Home Society report 75.

REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, JR., in his Sunday-night services discards the white surplice, wears only the black gown, omits the whole service of evening prayer, reads only the Apostles' Creed from the prayer-book, makes extemporaneous prayers and sings revival hymns printed on slips of paper, and, we may add, is attracting crowds to his service, doing a good work for the Master.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS.—The Southern Illinois Yearly Meeting held its fifth session with the church at Uniontown, Kentucky, last month. The report on the state of religion says: "All of our churches but two are steadfast; some new ones have been added and are doing well. All of our ministers are still faithful and active. No deaths among them. Net gain of five churches and three hundred and two members."

AT A RECENT meeting of the Methodist clergy of New York city Rev. Prof. Blyden, of Liberia, created a sensation by pronouncing a eulogy upon Mohammedan morals. In many respects they transcended the Christian article, he said. Liquor was drunk in Liberia; never among the Mohammedans. Indeed it was the Mohammedan belt that thus far had protected Central and pagan Africa from the introduction of Christian rum.

THE Egyptian mission of the United Presbyterian Church, in Egypt, has a printing office, which is kept busy on religious literature for the native Egyptians. Last year it sent out nearly four hundred thousand pages of tracts, the demand for which is steadily on the increase. The Liberians, too, are using the printing press with good effect. The Liberia Advocate is published at Monrovia, in the interest of Christian missionary work in Africa. It is a large quarto.

AT THE late anniversary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, in Exeter Hall, London, Rev. William Morley Punshon was one of the speakers. The great pulpit orator attracted an immense crowd. The past was a very prosperous year, the receipts being nearly $900,000. The society sustains missions in the West Indies, South and West Africa, Ceylon, India and the islands of the South Pacific. The report stated that over 100,000 people of the Feejee Islands attended Christian worship.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association has recently been celebrating its jubilee. The society proposes to celebrate its jubilee by raising a fund of £10,000 to aid in the erection of new places of worship and the augmentation of ministerial stipends. "If," said the chairman, "I am asked for what these churches are to be built, I would reply: To propagate Unitarian Christianity; and if I am further asked what I mean by that term, I would say that I understand by it simply pure Theism, as taught by Jesus Christ." The number of Unitarians in Great Britain does not appear to have been reported.

THE twenty-first Conference of the French Methodist preachers was held in the city of Nimes, France, early in June. Bishop Harris was expected as a visitor, on his way through France to England. Pastor Hocart was appointed to Paris to take the place of the lamented Emile Cooke. The Conference consists of twenty-four ordained ministers, the largest number ever before assembled. The resignation of Rev. Mr. Andrieu was accepted, his health not permitting him to change circuits. The Young Men's Educational College at Nimes was found to be in a flourishing condition. The stationing committee were granted permission to station three men for a period of over three years.

THE thirtieth anniversary of the Ragged School Union institution took place in London recently. A choir of 600 young people was on the platform. There are at present in connection with the union 72 day schools, with 10,018 scholars. Educationally, the examiners stated, the condition of the children was satisfactory. The number of voluntary teachers was 2,057, in addition to 231 paid teachers and 285 paid monitors. The shoeblack brigade for the year has been 337, and their earnings had amounted to £11,880. The general receipts of the year were £3,172. The Earl of Shaftesbury closed the proceedings with a characteristic address.

A CAREFUL OBSERVER, speaking of the work of evangelization in India, says: "Statistical facts can in no way convey any adequate idea of the work done in any part of India. The effect is often enormous where there has not been a single avowed conversion, and is manifested in very different ways, according to the nationality, the creed, and even the professions in life and place of residence, urban or rural, of the native community." And another says: "A revolutionary change is in progress, and it seems not improbable that this generation will not pass away before the Christian churches of India will have gathered in many millions of the population to the one fold and the one Shepherd."

AT THE last meeting of the Scotch Reformed Presbyterian Synod a memorial was presented from the session of Coatbridge, asking the appointment of a committee "with a view to the selection of such hymns as may be used in Sabbath schools, in meetings for prayer and for public worship." The synod replied, with only one dissenting voice, that while it would not impose any restraint on the exercise of Christian liberty in the occasional use of well-approved hymns in the public worship of God, it deemed it inexpedient to enter on the preparation of any collection at the present time. This action is an advance on the previous positions of this church, and is ascribed to the revival services of Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

AN ENGLISHMAN, reporting a Liverpool union revival meeting, says: "It is impossible to have such unions as these without some good being done. For instance, two infidels are said to have been present. No argument, no address seemed to reach them at all. But at the close the Rev. H. M. K. Aitken, a successful clergyman, was moving among the people and earnestly pleading with them to give their hearts to God. The fact of an established clergyman being in a dissenters' chapel, and so zealously working for the salvation of men, so impressed the two men that one of them said: 'Nothing has shaken me so much for years as that. There must be something in it.'" We see, however, that Rev. R. F. Spencer, a London (England) Episcopalian clergyman, announced to take part in the services of a nonconformist church, has been warned by the Bishop of London to abstain from such a course, under a threat of severe penalties if the course is persisted in.

THE New York Observer says that the place for the assembly of the next General Conference is now under discussion, and it is proposed to enter into correspondence with the various Evangelical Alliances as to the expediency of meeting in the city of Jerusalem or in Rome; or perhaps of commencing the session in one place and concluding it in the other. The council of the British Alliance have been given to understand that a conference in the Holy Land, by a combined delegation of European and American members of the Evangelical Alliance, is practicable, and that it would be likely to promote the interests of the gospel in the East; and that, on their return, meetings might be arranged to be held in Rome, thus combining both objects in the same Christian enterprise. They therefore commend the proposal to serious consideration, and invite an expression of opinion before taking measures to obtain the approval and co-operation of the American and foreign branches of the Alliance.

FROM a Mexican paper we clip the following testimony to the success of gospel ministry in that country: "These of our readers who have been long enough in this country to remember the time when heathen (?) foreigners were pelted with stones by the mob, if, unacquainted with the religious customs of the people, the said foreigners failed to take their hats off when a procession of fat and good-natured priests, of wooden saints and wax candles, passed by, and the time when a dissenter from the Romish religion was looked upon as a heretic and as a detestable being—those readers, we say, cannot but fully appreciate the wondrous change that has been effected in Mexico within the past decade, and the rapidity with which that fanaticism is disappearing. We have a proof of the above in the fact that the difficult and delicate labors of the Christian missionaries in Mexico have been thus far crowned with success. In this city alone, in this at one time fanatical town, there are some five Protestant churches, largely and regularly attended, and it is truly surprising to see the large number of converts that have been gained over from the ranks of the Roman Catholics. Though quietly and noiselessly, the Protestant religion is rapidly gaining ground in Mexico."

Something Wanted.

The young man who came to Jesus with his question about eternal life may have had misgivings before he approached the Master. He had everything of an earthly nature that he could desire—he was young, honored and rich. There were none of the humiliations and hardships of poverty in his cup. He was not doomed to toil and menial employment in order to procure a meager and precarious subsistence. He could live at his ease, in such style as pleased him best. His virtues, social position and wealth commanded the deference and respect of the world. There was a want which these conditions left unsatisfied. Eternal life was something above the life he possessed, without which, to the serious and considerate, temporal prosperity is but a mockery. Perhaps he thought, however, that his case, in this respect, was not altogether bad, and that the answer of the great Teacher would quiet the fears which sometimes intruded upon his more thoughtful moments. It may have taken the shape of only an occasional doubt, which would come unbidden to the surface now and then. In the main tenor of his life he attempted to persuade himself that his prospects for the world to come were tolerably well assured. To use a commercial phrase, his securities were not gilt-edged, but they were far from having gone to protest.

He wished, and wishing hoped, that all was well. Why should he not banish all suspicion of danger when he could say with reference to the commandments: "All these things have I kept from my youth up?" That was a record of which few could boast, and something to be proud of. But the question still comes up, half vauntingly, it may be, but half seriously also: "What lack I yet?" His worldly prosperity could not banish the shadow which sometimes fell upon his soul, and now, with a blameless moral life under review, can he be free from all uncertainty? He had kept the commandments; even his youth was clear of the wildness and rashness which too often falls to that period of life. He might have had just a shade of misgiving. Not likely that more could be required. There seemed to be no flaw in the title; but could he trust it? This suspicion that all was not right, this surmise that there was lack in some direction, was confirmed. The test came in the demand for self-denial and sacrifice. His obedience had been far from perfect, and he was an idolater at heart, though conforming in outward conduct to the divine law. The requirement of the Savior that he should sell his property, and give away the proceeds, exposed the real defect. The root of the matter was not in him, his religion was marred and incomplete in its most essential part, and he was not ready to be perfect in the crucifixion of "the flesh with the affections and lusts."

His lack was Christ, but he was unwilling to accept Christ when this acceptance came in the way of his covetousness and love of the world. God only knows how many moral and even professedly religious people, in these days, would have stood this test any better. Not always in this way is the thing needed brought to light. It depends on our circumstances—the many variant shapes in which this subtle idol worship is set up in the heart. Moral observances are comparatively easy, and religion is comfortable enough if we can be permitted to go on in our selfish ways and indulge in those heart-sins which are most agreeable to us.

Some may go away sorrowful, perhaps also after awhile to return in penitence to a true conversion; but too many seek to drive away the stings of an uneasy conscience. There is something wanted, but they have not the honesty and courage to meet the question: "What lack I yet?" Such morality and religion as they have will hardly do to trust. This coming judgment may wake up new issues—new to them—and there may be elements in the account of which they have thought but little. Eternal life may be a character, after all, which embraces and exacts far more than the outward and one-sided view and attainments which they have reached. They are building their house—building it with some care; every pillar, beam and wall are workman-like, but there are portents of fierce-blowing winds and madly-rushing floods. Perhaps the house will stand. Perhaps! It requires more courage than some people have to examine the foundations. The rock may not be there, and flesh and blood can neither reveal that rock nor build upon it.

If there is doubt, if there is this disquiet, if we have but just begun to question our title to eternal life, it is better to come to Jesus at once. Out with it, and face the painful disclosure which only promises to shiver the unwarranted hopes you have endeavored to cherish. Be willing to know the worst, and be sure that Christ will lay his hand upon the very idol you most dearly love. Will you let him break it, and will you consent that he shall guide you to real peace and assurance? True religion requires both honesty and heroism. The road to perfection—perfection of Christian faith and comfort, as compared with the uncertainties and vacillations of the unregenerate and unconsecrated heart—lies in the direction of self-abandonment and an unreserved following of Christ. To have the perfection of such discipleship there must be virtually the selling and giving of all. The principle must be covered by a devotion that turns away from no sacrifice, and that loses sight of the sacrifice in the completeness and joy of a Savior found.

Centenary Commencement.

MR. EDITOR: In approaching Jackson we found the roads heavy and it was still raining. On Sabbath morning there was no change for the better, but quite a good audience awaited the preacher. Bishop Marvin gave us a delightful sermon, full of good sense, sound words and lofty Christian sentiment. Just before the sermon he baptized the infant child of the Rev. J. Wilkinson—"Mary." It was a beautiful sight in that large chapel hall—the minister holding the tender one in his arm, the water falling in clear drops from his hand upon the soft brow of the babe, the slight quiver of its lip at the unexpected shower, and then the placid assent of its little face to all the fortunes of the people of God. What ordinance is more radiant than this one in the holy sanctuary, or more expressive of the glory of his grace whose covenants are with us and our children!

On Monday evening the preparatory department gave us a succession of declamations, in which the young gentlemen acquitted themselves fairly. One of the dialogues and two of the speakers were of capital merit.

On Sunday morning the members of the Union Society met in their hall to bid adieu to their graduating members. The occasion was enlivened by speeches from Bishop Marvin, Revs. Watkins, Montgomery, Brown and Godfrey, and also from Messrs. Magruder, Walker, Goodale, Hardee and others. It was a sprightly and instructive hour. All the speeches were happy and to the point.

At night there was a joint exhibition of the two literary societies. The audience was worthy of the best ante-bellum days—brilliant and large. We were glad to see gentlemen of influence present from the States of Mississippi and Louisiana, of various professions and callings. The hall had assumed its ancient grandeur and beauty, and had been much improved in its acoustic properties. Everything was gratifying and hopeful to those who had seen it, but a few years before, all in decay and silence.

On commencement day the weather was fine. Some seventy carriages were in the campus. The platform was filled with the trustees, the ministers of the two patronizing Conferences, the faculty and distinguished visitors. The salutatory was by Thomas Cage Gordon, of Jackson, Louisiana. It was well delivered. "Science—Its Advancement," by A. R. Holcombe; "The Living Present and the Dawning Future," by J. C. Gordon; and "God Seen in History," by Walter Augustus White, were excellent speeches. Valedictory by A. R. Holcombe. The baccalaureate, by the president, was able and in fine taste, both as to style and manner. The address to the societies followed, by Rev. Dr. Tudor. It was fully equal to the occasion and to the favorable expectations of his audience. Bishop Marvin wound up this refreshing annual reunion by a speech that charmed and strengthened the hearts of all the friends of Centenary.

The grounds of the college never looked more beautiful. All the glass had been replaced in its windows. The great columns have had their bases smoothed and reformed, the west wing had been repaired, and all things have put on an appearance of stability and health highly gratifying to its old friends. May its patronage the next year increase from one hundred to one hundred and fifty students. K.

Oregon Correspondence.

MR. EDITOR: The summer is now upon us in full blast. The thermometer stands at eighty-two at four P. M. to-day. There is a most refreshing gale from the Pacific, across the Coast Range mountains. Mary's peak, about fifteen or twenty miles west, lifts its proud summit far above the other peaks of the chain. The sides are clothed with forest-trees in full foliage, while the apex is bare and bald as a prairie, save a few patches of snow here and there, the remnants of the snows of the past winter. A few more days and it will entirely disappear. Then, to see snow, we will have to look east and north, and the Three Sisters and Mounts Jefferson and Hood regale the eye with their eternal snows.

I have just gotten home from a quarterly meeting thirty miles above here. It was a camp meeting. A grove of young firs furnished a dense shade. A temporary stand or pulpit was erected, looking up a slight inclination. Seats were arranged in front and on either hand. A few benches from an adjacent schoolhouse, together with the chairs of the tenters, furnished seats for say five hundred. This, with straw (and how I like straw for camp meetings—I got religion in the straw) made a comfortable and delightful place for worship. It is an easy thing to have camp meetings in this country. People go forty, fifty and seventy-five miles in their wagons, carrying family, bedding, provisions, cooking utensils and tent fixtures. They pitch their tents like soldiers—drive forks in the ground for tables; some bring cooking stoves along. All this is the work of a few minutes in many instances. We have no red bugs or ticks to prey upon us and leave their impress for many days. At home the cows and calves are turned together, the chickens are bountifully fed, and the whole premises left for days without the fear of thieves. June and July are leisure months with the farmer to a great extent. The camp fires are pleasant mornings and evenings, and the food is good and wholesome. Infidels as well as Christians often go to camp meeting, with their families, as a place of recreation and pleasure. We had good order in the main. Attention to the word was marked; an influence observable by the falling tear or the hearty Methodistic response. We had some good old-fashioned shouting. Oregon is a great country for babies who are endowed with fine lungs. If last Sunday at the camp meeting is to be taken as a sample. But I say: Let the sisters come along and bring their babies, even if they do cry some. A preacher here ought to have a good voice. Bro. Mathews could have held up admirably. I must confess I faltered. We had a good meeting. The church was quickened and revived. Ten persons applied for church membership up to the time I had to leave, going by way of home eighty or ninety miles to my next camp meeting below. The roads are fine, and with my light buggy and young pair of horses, and Ernest as a traveling companion, I measure distance with speed. I am now halting a part of two days at home to burnish my armor for the conflict in Yam Hill county. O that God may pour out his Spirit as on the day of Pentecost! We need a spiritual baptism from on high. I feel that in this new field of operation my labors are not in vain. The God that led me here is sustaining me. This is a great and inviting field of ministerial usefulness, but many are the adversaries. We need a few more earnest, zealous preachers. Such need have no fears of a good living. The people here are not trained to systematic giving. Indeed I will put old Moreau Street against anything I know of. I have felt greatly concerned about our church and people in Louisiana. At this remote point I can only sigh, and breathe the silent prayer that our heavenly Father may shield and protect the innocent and helpless, and bring to naught the schemes and plans of the wicked and licentious. May our God avert the evils threatened, and grant you peace, prosperity and the reign of grace!

With my Christian love to the household, and many, many dear friends, including the agent and employees of 110 and 112 Camp street, I remain affectionately,

T. B. WHITE.

CORVALLIS, OREGON, June 30, 1874.

Prayer-Meeting Talk.

We learn from history that the fruits of many great victories have been lost through the presumptuous confidence which the victory has inspired. The great battle of Cannæ, won by Hannibal and the Carthaginians over the Romans, is an illustration. So many of the better class of Romans were slain that three bushels of gold rings were taken from their fingers. The victory was most complete. But the vain confidence it inspired led to voluptuousness and loss of soldierly discipline. The Romans had time to rally and recuperate. The Carthaginians were beaten, driven out of Europe, and their empire utterly ruined.

The unfortunate man who had long been the victim of intemperance in drink is another example of the vain confidence of victory. He had many times, in passing to his home, been tempted to call in at a drinking saloon and part with his money and his brains. But one time he made a great effort and safely passed the dangerous place. He was much elated at this proof of his decision and courage—so much so that he resolved to treat so good a resolution; and so, alas! lost all that he had won.

We see the same thing in the license which persons in good health will take in the vain confidence that they can do as they please. So at watering-places, where the air is pure, the water sanitary, people commit excesses they would not dare perpetrate at home.

All this finds its counterpart in spiritual experiences. In the first burst of the joy of pardoned sin how strong our confidence! The enemy is beaten; he has fled crippled and howling from the disastrous field; he will never return again. We may call in our picket guards, and all the camp may sleep.

We feel strong, but we are strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, and only in him. Here, then, is our danger—the danger of a vain, presumptuous confidence—of trusting in ourselves and failing to watch and pray. The fire that fell at the dedication of the tabernacle and the temple did surely fall from heaven, but then men had to gather and apply the fuel and keep it burning. So the love, the power, the zeal for God and the heavenly-mindedness have come from above; but we must exercise, cherish and develop these graces—walking in the fear of God, praying in the Holy Ghost and keeping ourselves in the love of God.

Our spiritual enemy has been beaten, but he has not been destroyed. He will return again guised in manifold temptations; sometimes to doubt, sometimes to presume, and sometimes to love and worship the world. He pursues with a wing that never wearies, a foot that never tires and hate that never cools or abates—ever waiting to surprise and strike the fatal blow.

It is true discipline improves our soldiership; we learn to "endure hardness and bear burdens." We learn the strategy of the enemy, his modes of attack and how to parry his blows, but still the fight continues, and will until we write "We have conquered" on our shields. Then the Master shall say: "It is enough; come up higher; enter into rest." The bugle has sounded a truce, the din of battle has died away in the far-off distance; we are out of bowshot and gunshot of the enemy, crowned with life and palmed with victory—forever saved, forever blest. Galveston Christian Advocate.

Religious Liberty in Italy.

The Pope is at his old tricks again—or rather at the old tricks by which the papacy has ever striven to coerce the ignorant and superstitious by working on their fears. In certain portions of Italy, especially in the provinces of Milan and Venice, the people, having acquired some sense of self-respect and manliness under the operation of their renewed national life as one of the great European powers, have had the hardihood to think for themselves in matters of religion. Trying "the spirits" by the word of God, many of them have rejected the cunningly-devised fables with which the Church of Rome has for so long overlaid and obscured the Scriptures, and have even gone such lengths as to dare to choose for themselves who shall minister over them in things spiritual, as other Protestant organizations are wont to do. Quite a number of villages have participated in steps of this kind, moved thereto by their consciences and the new light that has been thrown upon their minds by the efforts of evangelical Christians, and by a perusal of the Bible, which has been distributed among them. To arrest the spread of this dangerous exhibition of religious freedom and liberty of conscience among the Italians, a decree has been issued by the Romish "Congregation of the Council," threatening the penalty of major excommunication against all those who presume to make choice of their own parish priests, and by which, among other preposterous things, they are denounced to be avoided as aliens or thieves. We append a summary of this presumptuous decree, which is likely to prove as efficacious as did a similar decree against the people of Switzerland, or as would a bull of the Pope directed against the comet. The day of excommunications is nearly spent, and exists only for those whose minds are darkened by a servile spirit and beclouded by a fantastic superstition which rejects the truth while it hugs imposture. The following is a summary of the decree of the "Congregation of the Council:"

"After having deplored the efforts of wicked sectaries, who, almost everywhere coming into power, try to destroy the constitution of the church, the sacred congregation are astonished to find that they have gone so far as to unsettle the minds of the people in Catholic Italy, who, in imitation of some unhappy districts of Switzerland, have dared to arrogate to themselves the right to elect the pastors of souls. The congregation are especially astonished that ecclesiastics have been found sufficiently depraved to accept the office offered to them. In consequence his holiness, Pius the Ninth, has resolved to apply in Italy the same remedies with which the evil has been fought in Switzerland. The Archbishops of the provinces of Venice and of Milan, and the Bishops of the various dioceses under them, are to inform their flocks that the election of parish priests by the people is forbidden by the church, under penalty of major excommunication."—Christian Intelligencer.

The Bible in Spain.

Mr. George Lawrence, says the Bible Society Record, to whom we have sent a few Bibles and Testaments for distribution in Spain, continues his work without ceasing. After speaking of the troubles, consequent on the Carlist insurrection, he says:

"On the day before one of the dreadful fights I sold more Scriptures to military officers and men than I remember to have sold in any one day. I doubt not the Spirit of God was leading many to procure the saving word ere they were called to their account in another world. The large text, 'The Wages of Sin is Death,' appeared to call general attention, and certainly, during the days of mourning and heart-rending sorrows, these words must have proved arrows of conviction to all who passed this Bible coach. We had, and continue to have since then, many opportunities of speaking the gospel to crowds. Last week a lady was passing the coach on her way from mass, with her missal in hand, when her eyes caught the text above mentioned. She gazed at it some time; at last she came up and asked where she could purchase or find such words. A New Testament was produced, and the words pointed out. She appeared very thoughtful, and said that, as she carried no money, she would send her servant for it on her return home; in a little time the servant came and purchased the golden treasure. A little time ago an old gentleman came and wanted a large-type family Bible; he said his sons had brought home a Bible from the French Exhibition, and that he had read it constantly, but now, his eyes becoming dim, he wanted a suitable type.

"Mr. Carlyle, a godly young man who had come from Scotland to labor in the good work, penetrated into some towns surrounded by Carlist bands, and managed to sell one hundred and twenty of your Testaments; he sold them at a cheap rate, but I was glad that by any means the word may get into the people's hands.

"We have in our Sunday school a young man, about seventeen; he is an apprentice to a fan-maker. Some ten months ago he bought a Bible from the blind man in the Ramble. He was afraid to let his master know. After reading some time in the New Testament he came to the conclusion that he found more comfort in reading it than in going to mass, and so when his master sent him to mass he would steal away and read the word; but he was found out, and his master got very angry. But the boy continued so firm, and his general behavior was so good, that God heard his prayer, and his master let him go where he liked—and that was to Sunday school. On his introduction to the school I asked him to repeat to the school any text he had learned. For three-quarters of an hour he went on, repeating psalm after psalm, and chapter after chapter. The tears came to many of our boys' and girls' eyes as they heard this new comer repeat so many precious portions."

REV. J. MATTHEWS, writing from Chappell Hill, Texas, July 6, says:

We have just passed through a most delightful occasion at Chappell Hill, Texas. The commencement exercises of Chappell Hill Female College and Soule University closed on the twenty-fourth of June. These institutions are the property of the Texas Annual Conference. The Rev. E. D Pitts, late of Alabama, at the head of the female college, is the very idol of this interesting community. To educate the mind, impress the heart and mold and fashion female character seems to be his appropriate work. Not a whisper of detraction is heard in the circle where he moves.

President McNeely, also late of Alabama, at the head of the male department, closed his first session to the gratification of all concerned. How gratifying to have such men, in such important positions, accomplishing their work so successfully. May they long live to bless this community and surrounding country.

THE Christian Neighbor cries for mercy. So do we. Hear what Bro. Browne says:

To Correspondents.—A sudden small flood of lengthy communications, in conjunction with these hot days, prompts the cry: Let communications be short, short, for whatsoever is a line over two pages of foolscap, or four of note paper, cometh of a want of mercy on editor and reader. And blessed he writers that stop short of the suggested limit. The Scripture says expressly: "The righteous man regardeth the life of his beast."—Proverbs xii, 10.

Dedication of Our German Chapel.

The Richmond Christian Advocate of July 9 says:

On last Sabbath the German Methodist chapel, recently erected on Leigh street, in this city, was formally set apart for sacred use by appropriate services.

At half-past ten A. M. the Rev. E. N. S. Blogg, superintendent of German missions in Maryland and Virginia, and the Rev. F. Bickle, the pastor of the chapel, conducted the religious exercises in the German language. The Rev. Mr. Bickle preached in German.

Bishop Doggett, at half-past four, after a brief and fitting discourse, received and dedicated the church according to our usage.

The Rev. John E. Edwards, D. D., preached at half-past eight in the evening.

The edifice is of brick, tastefully designed and substantially built.

This is the first German Methodist church erected and regularly served by a pastor in the bounds of the Virginia Conference. A substantial and increasing membership and a Sunday school of one hundred and twenty pupils were among the tokens of success on the occasion of the dedication. The Rev. Dr. Edwards paid a high tribute to the tireless efforts of Bro. Blogg in raising funds for the completion of a house of worship where the Germans can hear the gospel in their own tongue.

There was a liberal collection at the close of Bishop Doggett's sermon.

Many of our city pastors were present at the afternoon services.

INFORMATION WANTED.—If there is any church in the whole of these Southern States, or in any other part of creation, that is in a healthful state, having the divine blessing in full measure, and yet is in arrears for payment of its pastor's salary, I desire the clerk of session, or some other member, to put me in communication with it.

If there is any one, anywhere in the world, male or female, rich or poor, young or old, black or white, in city or country, who has given as God requires to give, and has not been blessed in property and in soul, I request from them a full statement of their experience in this matter over their own signatures.

If there is anywhere a church member who fails to honor the Lord with his substance, and yet enjoys his property, I would thank him to send me his address.

If there is anybody who has the full assurance of faith, who daily lives in the conscious enjoyment of the divine favor, and yet is not a cheerful giver, I would like to have his name.—Christian Observer.

CAPTAIN ROBERT P. HUNTER.—We are pained to announce the death of Captain Robert P. Hunter, son-in-law of the Rev. Dr. A. L. P. Green, says the Nashville Christian Advocate, which took place at the residence of the doctor, near Nashville, July 10, 1874. He died of consumption. The event is the more affecting as his infant child was removed by death a few weeks since, and Dr. Green himself has been lying in a very critical condition for some time. Captain Hunter was a most estimable Christian gentleman. He was a brave officer in the late war, commanding a company of infantry in Zollicoffer's brigade. After the surrender he married Miss Anna—daughter of Dr. Green—who, with three children, mourns the loss of a most devoted husband and father. He was a merchant of inflexible integrity—held in the highest esteem by the business community. He was a member of McKendree church—a consistent Christian—living and dying in the faith of Jesus. His obsequies were performed at McKendree church on Sunday afternoon, a large congregation being in attendance.

MARTHA WASHINGTON COLLEGE, Abingdon, Virginia, is widely celebrated, and stands among the very first of the Southern female colleges. The buildings and grounds are very fine, the climate salubrious, and there is a full and able faculty. President Jones is a graduate of the University of Virginia, and an eminently successful educator. Rev. Dr. W. G. E. Cunningham is also connected with the college. We can commend Martha Washington without reservation to the patronage of our people. See advertisement in this week's ADVOCATE.

THE Alabama Conference Female College, Tuskegee, Alabama, is justly regarded as one of our very best institutions of learning. President Moore is well qualified for the position he occupies, and is one of the most honored and popular preachers in our connection. We are informed that Rev. T. W. Dyer will be connected with the college during the coming year. Bro. Dyer acquired an enviable reputation in New Orleans as an accomplished teacher. He will prove a decided accession to the faculty. See advertisement in another column.

BISHOP WIGHTMAN gave us a brief call on Wednesday, the fifteenth instant. He was just from a District Conference near Moss Point, Mississippi, and, tarrying in the city but a few hours, took the train for Brookhaven, to attend a District Conference at that place. The Bishop is looking well, but evidently hard-worked—perhaps overworked.

DR. BENNETT, in the Richmond Christian Advocate of July 9, makes the following announcement:

The undersigned hereby announces that from this date the Rev. John J. Lafferty, until recently the editor of the Lexington Gazette, will be associated equally with him in the publication and editorial management of the Richmond Christian Advocate.

Free Churches.

We take the following, says the Christian Age, from the Church Union, which excellent paper no doubt made sure of its facts before stating them:

"The attempt to support free religious worship, as it is called, has been tried in all forms for fifty years, and has everywhere, in this region, proved a failure, simply because the great mass of people give nothing. Not the poor simply, but persons in good circumstances, prefer to have a free gospel to a gospel that costs them something. The building that had been the Chatham Theater exulted in free seats and free preaching. The concern went out of sight, leaving not a fragment behind. David Hale bought the old Tabernacle, and founded a Congregational church, to have a free place of worship. Yet the Tabernacle now demands the highest pew rents of any church in the city. Mr. Hepworth opened Steinway Hall to preach the gospel to the masses free of cost. Though his house was crowded, his collections did not pay the rental of the room. The idea of a free church was nominally kept up, but four hundred seats were reserved, and rented at a sum from $5 to $10 a sitting, to cover expenses. Bishop Cummins started with the idea of having no pew rentals. Yet after three months' experience, with audiences averaging eight hundred, the plate collections are not sufficient to pay the rent of Steinway Hall. A few men who have been meeting the expenses of the society are tired of it, and demand some plan by which the general congregation can aid in the work. The idea of a free tabernacle for Dr. Talmage's society was practically abandoned at the start. Families were invited to select such seats as they chose. But they were immediately assessed and a bill sent in for collection."

We thought our beloved cotemporary had a fair knowledge of the workings of the Church of the Strangers. That still has free seats. No assessment is made, no bill is sent. The members and regular attendants are expected to subscribe, and this subscription, together with the offertory on Sunday, meets expenses. It is true that many prosperous people give nothing. But they are just the kind of people that need good solid instruction and downright gospel preaching, because no people are in greater danger of hell than people who steal their religious privileges. They are just as willing that this kind of larceny should be perpetrated in the Church of the Strangers as in any other.

Many cannot give, and it is delightful to know that they sit with the richest people in the land, without any such feeling of humiliation as would keep them from enjoying the sanctuary.

We do not think free churches fail because people "prefer to have a free hotel to a gospel that costs them something." The secret is elsewhere. Zero is supposed to be a kind of respectability in pewed churches. People like to boast of the amount they pay for their pews. Sometimes men move to the city for business purposes, and take pews in churches just because they rent stores in eligible situations. They find it hard to pay the rent of store or pew; but it is a business investment. They eat scantier meals to pay the pew rent, when they would not contribute a cent to the church. They cannot afford to attend a free church; they have not got that far along yet. For business and social reasons they must, and they are well established, at a church where it is known to be costly, just as some people think they must live on Fifth avenue to be respectable.

The pastor of one of our most fashionable churches, a capital preacher and a charming gentleman, once told us that, in his opinion, pewed churches suppressed free, churches, and that he was sure there would be a great readjustment of congregations if all churches were free.

We rejoice in any arrangement that brings people under the influence of the gospel. We cannot have the same church economy for all classes and all kinds of people. Only let the gospel be preached.

The Baptist Union has an article on "Young Ministers," in the course of which it says:

"More than ordinary grace is needed to make a 'good minister' of a young man. There is danger that assertion will become conceit, boldness become vanity, ardor subside to complacency, enterprise degenerate to grambling, and bitter criticism of older men and established measures, and the spirit of devotion and sacrifice crystallize into greed of money, indulgence and service refuse, rather than service rendered. The heart for any man to be emptied of self and filled with Christ, but prayer for the young whose blood is warm and courage high. They are easily inclined to delight in their own strength and wisdom and command, if not at once appreciated, to complain, become sour and fall back from effort in disdain. Christ resists crucifixion, refuses room for Jesus, yearns for recognition, looks for pay, and slowly yields to the higher impulse to work from love of Christ and needy souls. Occasionally one is "crucified with Christ," emptied of self, and clothed with divine power, every faculty sweetly subjected to the lovely spirit, and made to glow with holy enthusiasm. Then strength and order are meek and tender, patient and loving, bold and trustful, careful and persistent. It is a glorious thing for a young minister to be sanctified and "strengthened with might in the inner man of the Holy Ghost." Entering into this higher life, his weapons are mighty through spiritual wickedness, the power of God is upon and works within him.

WHERE GOD IS NOT.—A child, instructed in a Sabbath school, on being asked by his teacher if he could tell in a place where God was not, gave the following striking and unexpected reply: "Not in the thoughts of the wicked."

Seashore Camp Ground.

The annual camp meeting on the Seashore camp ground, two miles west of Biloxi, Mississippi, will commence on Friday, the twenty-fourth of July, and continue beyond the second Sabbath.

Great improvements have been made on the grounds since the encampment of last year. The number of private tents has been more than doubled, and several additional public tents have been erected.

A number of plain but comfortable wooden tents, with good floor and roof, are being put up for rent to individuals or families desiring to hire, some 12 feet by 13, at $10, others 12 feet by 25, at $15, for the period of the camp meeting.

Persons desiring to erect cloth or other temporary tents will have comfortable positions assigned them on application to any member of the board of trustees.

Gentlemen of experience in the business have been placed in charge of the boarding department, who will furnish good and satisfactory board on the terms of last year, to wit: Fifty cents for breakfast and supper each, and seventy-five cents for dinner, or $1.50 per day.

Lodging accommodations are provided for at fifty cents per night.

The trustees have made arrangements with the railroads for conveyance of passengers at reduced prices. By the New Orleans and Mobile railroad, from New Orleans for $3 25 and from Mobile for $2.50 for the trip, and proportionate prices from all the way stations; by the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern railroad and by the Mobile and Montgomery railroad at half the usual price of regular fare.

These roads will issue a special camp meeting ticket, with return coupon, which will require to be stamped at the office of the secretary on the camp ground in order to be good to return on.

The Mobile and Ohio railroad will sell tickets from any point south of Meridian to Mobile at three cents per mile. At Mobile parties will get the regular camp meeting ticket.

In this city tickets can be had at the ticket office, corner of Camp and Common streets, and at the depot, at the head of Canal street; and at the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, and at all the way stations on the roads.

Passenger trains will leave the depot, at head of Canal street, New Orleans, daily, at 8 A. M., 3.15 P. M. and 4 P. M.; and depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 8 A. M. and 5 P. M., all stopping at all way stations, including camp meeting station, except the 4 P. M. train from New Orleans, which will stop at the principal stations only, except on Saturdays, when it also will stop at camp meeting station.

Freight trains leave the depot, corner of Levee and Girod streets, New Orleans, at 8.25 A. M.; and the depot, foot of Government street, Mobile, at 9.30 A. M. daily, and take freight to or from the camp meeting at half the usual prices.

Persons desiring to attend the camp meeting are recommended to make arrangements for their comfort before the date of the camp meeting by application to any member of the board of trustees.

NEW ORLEANS, July 7, 1874.

"THE Rev. S. Anthony," says the Southern Christian Advocate, "has been steadily improving ever since his return to Georgia. He was able to be at every meeting of the board of trustees during commencement week, and was out at nearly all the exercises, both night and day. During the week Bro. Anthony was taking supper with other brethren, at the house of Bro. Christian, who lived some distance from the college chapel. Bro. McGehee, fearing he was not able to walk, borrowed a horse and buggy from a friend to convey him to the chapel. Bro. Anthony refused to ride, saying he could walk as well as any of the rest."

WE began to make a summary of all the reported injuries to human life and limb by the use of gunpowder on the Fourth of July, says the New York Observer, but the task proved too great. It is safe to say that more persons were killed or wounded on that day than in any battle of the revolutionary war.

A LITTLE explained, a little endured and a little passed over in silence, and lo! the rugged atoms fit like smooth mosaic.

MARRIED.

PRICE—TALIAFERRO.—By Rev. F. White, at his residence, on the second of July, 1874, Mr. W. N. Price, of Rapides parish, and Miss Leona L. Taliaferro, of Evergreen, Avoyelles parish, Louisiana. A life long happiness to Willie and Lonie.

MOORE—TAIT.—July 14, 1874, by Rev. T. W. Dyer, Rev. Henry D. Moore, president of the Alabama Conference Female College, at Tuskegee, to Miss Carrie M. Tait, daughter of Hon. Felix Tait, of Wilcox county, Alabama.

SANKEY—BOSWELL.—In Brookhaven, Mississippi, July 15, 1874, by Rev. E. H. Munger, Mr. William J. Sankey, of Columbus, Georgia, to Miss Susie A. Boswell, of Brookhaven.

THE demand for the Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, by guests who best understand how to make most palatable their soups, fish and meats, induces all the best hotel proprietors in the country to place it constantly upon their tables. jy23 4t

E. E. F. ROSS, ESQ., connected for several years with the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, left on the evening of June 17 to visit the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

CINCINNATI INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION.—We call attention to the advertisement of the above Exposition, which is really one of the first, if not the very first, and most important expositions of the kind in the United States. Having just returned home as our issue of this week is going to press, a more extended notice is deferred till our next.

OVER THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD BY DAYLIGHT.—Probably the best specimen of an American highway to be found anywhere is the Pennsylvania railroad between Pittsburg and New York. In solidity of construction, superiority of bridge architecture and smoothness of track it is unrivaled. Throughout its entire length it is laid with a double track of steel rails, weighing sixty-seven pounds to the yard. The rolling stock is as near perfection as human ingenuity can make it, combining the highest excellence attainable. On the first of June commenced running the fast train from Pittsburg to New York, with close connections at Harrisburg for Baltimore and Washington. The magnificent run of four hundred and forty-four miles between Pittsburg and New York is made with but three stoppages. The train is made up of Pullman parlor cars and the company's best day coaches all splendidly upholstered, mounted on combination springs, and furnished with plate glass, through which the landscape can be distinctly seen. The scenery on this line is beautiful, and in many places grand. The attractions of the Alleghany mountains need no comment. The long sweeps of wooded hills, lofty mountains and dark ravines, picturesque valleys opening into each other, sparkling and placid waters, and wide-rolling pastoral landscapes fall in rapid succession. After having breakfasted in the Mississippi valley and dined at the capital of Pennsylvania, the passenger finds himself seated at the supper-table in the metropolis of New York.

Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

"I confided to the care of the President, during the present session, two of my daughters, with very sanguine hopes of their improvement in health and culture. My expectations have been more than realized. From experience, then, as well as prepossession, I cordially and confidently recommend Martha Washington College to parents who are seeking the best advantages for their daughters."

Prof. L. C. Garland, LL. D., University of Mississippi.

"Martha Washington College possesses remarkable advantages as a seat of learning. * * * The corps of instruction is composed of ladies and gentlemen of ability, fidelity and professional skill."

Bishop H. N. McTyeire, D. D.

"If I were to search the land around I know not another Abingdon—beautiful for situation, healthful, accessible. Its social atmosphere is of the right sort for a female school—salubrious, not fast, conservative, well toned. The perfume of the 'Old Virginia' fingers about it still. Your immediate site, your grounds, please me more than any I have seen. Your shade-trees and your walks and your wide piazzas linger in my mind."

Faculty of the University of Virginia.

"We cordially recommend Major R. W. Jones, a Master of Arts of this institution, as a gentleman peculiarly well fitted by capacity, culture and experience for the conduct of an advanced seminary for young ladies."

THE GREATEST
MEDICAL DISCOVERY
OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,
FROM
The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both dandruff humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is

Raw and Inflamed,

your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

THE MEDICAL DISCOVERY

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly,

DONALD KENNEDY.

The Child's Corner.

THE DREAM.

A poem recited by a young lady at the Sunday school celebration, Marianna, Florida, June 24, 1874.

I dreamed, and lo! 'twas Sabbath eve:
Within a church I stood,
Secluded from the busy world,
And sheltered by a wood.
Its altar filled with mourning souls;
The young and old were there,
And one and all together sang
This old familiar prayer:
SONG—"Rock of Ages, cleft for me."

My heart was full, I wept for joy;
They had not sung in vain.
For God was in that holy place,
And souls were born again.
The congregation, deeply moved,
With earnest prayer renewed,
Another hymn of olden time
They sang in tones subdued:
SONG—"Am I a soldier of the cross?"

The scene was changed. And as I passed
Along the sea of Time,
The church of God, with one consent,
From earth's remotest clime,
United, in the self same hour,
One lofty strain to raise—
One loud, ecstatic burst of joy,
One glorious hymn of praise:
SONG—"When I can read my title clear."

Then swifter than the lightning's wing
In air I seemed to raise,
And in my dream a voice I heard
That filled me with surprise.
"'Tis done!" he cried. From heaven and earth
One glorious chorus broke,
And with that universal shout
I from my dream awoke:
SONG—"Blow ye the trumpet, blow."

Then let our congregations sing,
And let our earthly temples ring
With hymns of joy from every soul;
In every clime, from pole to pole,
Let all united join and raise
This old familiar song of praise:
SONG—"All hail the power of Jesus' name!"

Oh, rapturous music, how sublime!
I wept, and thought the olden time
Of Watts' and Wesley's earnest throng
Had with its flame inspired the song.
Oh, let us sing with one accord—
Join heart and voice to praise the Lord!

Treasure in Heaven's Bank.

The first snow was falling, and Lottie and Louis were watching it from the window with very happy eyes. The mother came and stood beside them, with an arm around each, and thought of another little girl and boy who twenty years ago used to watch the snow-flakes fall. Alas! the snows of a dozen winters had rested upon that brother's grave, and the snows of time had begun to fall on the sister's head.

But the mother's eye was bright, even when she thought of the early blessed dead. Hers was a happy home of love and temporal blessings. "She was not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household were clothed in scarlet"—that is, in warm, suitable garments.

Just then came creeping down the walk two little barefoot girls. One had a thin old shawl thrown over her head and half-bared arms, the other drew her scant sleeves down as far as she could over her red, cold hands.

"Poor little things!" said mother; "I am glad they happened to pass just now. I want you to look at them well, from their poor bare feet to their half-covered heads. Then I think you will like to leave watching the snow for awhile, and help me in some work I am going about."

"We are ready now, mother," said Lottie, jumping down and stealing her hand into her mother's.

The three went up stairs to the cedar closet. Here most of the winter clothes were stored in the summer-time.

"First we will look over this stocking-bag," said mother.

"Looking over" was always a delightful process with the children. Now mother laid out various little crimson-topped socks and outgrown stockings, and put them into the large clothes-basket on the middle of the floor. Next a box of flannel garments were looked over, and two or three sets of last year's robes were placed with the stockings.

"How you children do grow!" said mother, with a glad smile, as she looked at her chubby pets.

All the morning they spent among the drawers and boxes and presses, until the big basket was heaping full. Mother looked at the pile with great satisfaction.

"Now I mean to turn every article there to the very best account I can."

"Are you going to make a rag carpet, mother?" asked Lottie. "I should love to sew the rags for you. I helped Aunt Lucy once."

"No; better than that," said mother.

"May be she's going to sell them to the old China man, Lottie," said her little brother. "He brings beautiful things in his basket."

"Better than that, my dears. I am going to lay up treasure in heaven with them."

The children looked at each other a little puzzled, but Lottie soon suggested:

"I think you are going to give them to the poor."

"That is just it, Lottie; and our dear Lord says that he will regard all such acts of kindness, be they ever so small, as done to him; and, more than that, he says: 'They shall in nowise lose their reward.' They are treasures laid up in heaven for us. We cannot take with us any of our property when we leave this world, but we may send it on before us by doing good to Christ's poor."

The basket of clothing was well studied over and assorted, and a great many widows' hearts were made to leap for joy at the sight of a parcel made up from it. Many shivering little forms were comforted by the warm garments, and many heartfelt prayers went up to God for the kind givers.

It is better than great stores of gold to have the prayers of the poor in our favor. They can procure for us what money could not buy—the blessing of God.—Child's World.

A Hidden Prize.

FROM THE UNWRITTEN LIFE OF A CLERGYMAN.

We clip the following from the Christian Intelligencer:

"Here is a new Bible," said my mother the day I went to college. "You are going away from home, and will have many temptations. Now, my son, just as we are separating I have one request to make. Will you read it every day?" As I turned to examine the elegant clasps and binding I saw tears in mother's eyes—tears which she was vainly trying to keep back. Then I firmly resolved to read a chapter daily.

College introduced a set of companions entirely new to me. A livelier, merrier company never distinguished college walls. I was an extravagant lover of fun, and could always raise a laugh, so that I soon gained the reputation of a wit. We led a jolly life, amusing ourselves often in secret—to the cost of others and unconscious sacrifice of self. If we read anything, it was always of a humorous nature. We never ventured to dwell on serious subjects, dreading a snare. Flagrant offenses were, however, avoided, and like one of our friends of the present day we could say: "College is fine with one exception—the business of recitations!" But I was so well prepared, so far beyond most of my classmates, that I managed to sustain myself without study and without public disgrace.

Mother's letters were very affectionate, and she wrote often, but I always looked anxiously ahead, so as to "skip" any part suspected of solemnity and advice. In the course I was pursuing I could not possibly bear it.

In vacation I returned home. After the usual greetings of welcome, my trunk and wardrobe passed through mother's ordeal. Her careful hand unfolded each article. I stood by, and felt proud at her praises of my neatness and order. At the bottom of the trunk, under everything else, she found the Bible, and cheerfully inquired if I had remembered her request. I was speechless; she unclasped it, and opened to the middle. I started in surprise, for there were hidden two beautiful five-dollar notes, one crossing the other. I never shall forget the expression of her face as she softly said: "I wanted to give my son a pleasant surprise when away from home."

Mother died suddenly. I cannot doubt that she has been in heaven for many years; but I thank God that I was first able to ask her forgiveness, and show true repentance, and that she lived to see me a preacher of the Bible, delighting most of all to tell what peace the gospel can give to sinners. I remember once looking up from a sermon I was writing, and finding her eyes fixed on me from the next room. She said with a smile: "I have lived to see my son a minister of Christ, and it is happiness enough on earth."

I was my mother's only child, and she was a widow.

The Gift of Song.

A touching story is told of a little girl sent by her parents from Spain, during a time of religious persecution there, to take refuge with some friends in England. The vessel was lost on a rock-bound coast during a severe storm; but the little girl was saved through the efforts of some brave men. She was too young to tell her story, but, by a series of providential events, was brought at last to the house of the friend of her parents, just as, released from imprisonment, they arrived in England to seek their long-lost darling. A familiar tune that the mother had taught to her little girl in former days became the clew that led to their joyful meeting.

A remarkable incident is that of a Scottish youth, who learned with a pious mother to sing the old psalms, that were as household words to them in the kirk and by the fireside. When he grew up he wandered away from his native country, was taken captive by the Turks, and made a slave in one of the Barbary States. But he never forgot the songs of Zion, although he sung them in a strange land and to heathen ears. One night he was solacing himself in this manner, when the attention of some sailors on board of an English man-of-war was directed to the familiar tune of "Old Hundred," as it came floating over the moonlit waves. At once they surmised the truth, that one of their countrymen was languishing away his life as a captive. Quickly arming themselves, they manned a boat, and lost no time in effecting his release. What a joy to him after eighteen long years passed in slavery! Should not you think that he would ever after love the glorious tune of "Old Hundred?"

Children, never let your sweet young voices be employed in using profane or unseemly words. Learn many hymns. Good Martin Luther once said: "Singing hymns will keep the devil out of the heart." It is a quaint saying, but it is true. Furnish the mind with good things, and there will be no room for evil. They will be like "nails fastened in a sure place." You know when a nail is driven in tightly you cannot wedge anything else alongside of it. But you may have a tuneful voice and love to sing, and yet remain unaffected by the beautiful words. O how sad if they who sing about Jesus on earth shall not be of the number of the redeemed who join in the "new song" before the throne of God and the Lamb!—Child's World.

TRADES OF ANIMALS.—It has been well remarked by a clever author that bees are geometricians. The cells are so constructed as, with the least quantity of material, to have the largest-sized spaces and the least possible interstices. The mole is a meteorologist. The torpedo, the ray and the electric eel are electricians. Whole tribes of birds are musicians. The beaver is an architect, builder and woodcutter. He cuts down trees and erects houses and dams. The marmot is a civil engineer. He builds houses, and constructs aqueducts and drains to keep them dry. The ant is a soldier, and maintains a regular standing army. Wasps are paper manufacturers. Caterpillars are silk-spinners. The squirrel is a ferryman. With a chip or piece of bark for a boat, and his tail for a sail, he crosses a stream. Dogs, wolves, jackals and many others are hunters. Black bears and herons are fishermen. Monkeys are rope-dancers.

Farm, Garden and Household.

How to Protect Fruit from Birds.

A correspondent of the London Field says that his method has proven entirely efficacious: "And what, you will ask, is my talisman? Simply a ball of gray, white or brown linen thread. I take a ball of this in my hand, fasten the end of it to one of the twigs of the gooseberry or currant-bush, and then cross the thread backward, from twig to twig, in perhaps a dozen different directions, fasten off, and the thing is done; and it will last two years—the thread on the trees, I mean. It is not necessary that the thread should be white, of course; it ought rather to be fine and dark—a thing to be felt, not seen. I have watched the birds after performing the operation; they come boldly to settle on the trees, and they strike these to them invisible snares, for such, no doubt, they seem to be; they fly off in a terrible hurry, and settle on the walls and trees around about, longing and getting hungry, until they disappear and you see them no more.

"As regards pens and other seeds, which I always sow in drills, I simply stretch a thread, sometimes two, along each drill, at about two inches from the ground, supporting it at that height by little forked sticks. If you put it much higher than this the birds do not seem to care for it—it does not touch them; this is the grand secret, something they do not well see, nor know what it means. I have seen people put a thick white string, with feathers tied to it, and perhaps two feet from the ground. The birds soon understand these, and care little for them; in short, I know to my cost it sometimes acts as a lure, as a notice to the birds that there is something to be had worth looking after. I will answer for it, any one adopting the plan I recommend will never have cause to complain of the birds, however numerous they may be."

Culture of Beans.

The first requisite for a bean crop is thorough preparation of the ground. Beans cannot be successfully raised among clods and weeds. The ground should be made very mellow by repeated rolling and harrowing. My own plan has been to run light furrows, about twenty inches apart, and follow in these with a corn drill, planting the beans three or four inches apart in the row. (The brush must be taken out of the drill-box, and the orifice where the brush is fastened must be cut or filed out in order to plant them so thick.) This will require between three and four pecks to the acre, varying according to the size of the beans. Immediately after planting the ground should be harrowed again. Beans will usually come up in three to five days from the time of planting. The after-culture which I have practiced is plowing between the rows with a steady horse, a careful plowman, and a very narrow single-shovel plow. The cultivation should cease as soon as the beans begin to blossom.

I have found from the first to the fifth of June to be a very good time for planting; they will then ripen about the last of August, and the ground can easily be made ready for a wheat crop. The yield varies greatly, according to the season; fifteen bushels an acre is considered by many as a fair yield, but from twenty to thirty bushels can be raised in a favorable year by proper care and attention. "Navy" beans usually command twenty-five-to-fifty-cents more per bushel in the market than the ordinary kinds, but they are not so easily raised, and they ripen much later, frequently too late for the ground to be sown in wheat. Beans require a good soil, which must be well drained. They can be raised on very poor ground, but the yield will be correspondingly small. Seed beans purchased from the stores should be tested by sprouting a few before planting the crop, as they sometimes heat in bulk and will not grow.—New York Tribune.

CABBAGE CULTURE.—While all of the advice contained in the following reply of the New York Tribune to a novice in gardening meets our approval, we especially commend that part in which he is recommended to begin on a small scale:

"The Premium Flat Dutch, when true to name, is one of the most reliable kinds of cabbage for field culture. Sow the seed in rich garden soil, in rows twelve inches apart, about the first of May. Seed sown at this date will give sizable plants by the middle of June. They may be set out at any time from then until the first week in July, at distances two and one half between and two feet apart in the rows. Like onions, cabbages can only be made to pay when grown on strong, deep and rich ground. Sixty to seventy two-horse loads of barn-yard manure to the acre is none too much for cabbages. Five acres of this crop or of onions are, however, by far too much for a beginner to undertake. It would be much better policy to start with say half an acre of each the first year, and learn the details of the business from experience. It seldom turns out otherwise than in loss and disappointment when so much is attempted on the start by inexperienced persons. Heavy losses the first year always dishearten the novice."

MOTHS IN CARPETS.—Take strong alum-water; pour it on the floor to the depth of half a yard around the edge before laying your carpets; then once or twice during the summer sprinkle dry salt over the carpet before sweeping; insects do not like salt, and enough remains after sweeping to prevent their alighting on it. I was once very much troubled with moths in my parlor carpet, but have not been since using the salt.

BOSTON SUET PUDDING.—One cup of suet, chopped fine, one cup of molasses, one cup of milk, three cups and a half of flour, one cup of raisins, one teaspoonful of soda, two teaspoonfuls of cream tartar, one teaspoonful of cloves.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE NEXT TERM OF THIS VENERABLE INSTITUTION OPENS ON THE FIRST MONDAY IN OCTOBER, 1874.

Faculty.—REV. C. G. ANDREWS, A. M., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Political Economy and International Law; REV. A. R. HOLCOMBE, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Adjunct Professor of Natural Science; G. H. WILEY, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages; T. S. JONES, M. D., Professor of Natural Science; REV. R. D. NORSWORTHY, A. M., Principal of the Preparatory Department.

Charges.—Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in College, $60; Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in Preparatory Department, $40; Contingent expenses, $5. A matriculation fee of $5 must be paid on entering any regular college class. One-half the charges must be paid when the student enters; the other half on the beginning of the second term, March 1.

Board.—Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be had in the best families for $20 per month. Day-boarding with the same families, $12 per month. Rooms provided in the dormitories free of rent. Board to be paid in advance at least one month.

Location.—This institution is located in the lovely village of Jackson, about twelve miles from Bayou Sara, in a grove of pine, magnolia, oak and beech. The location is remarkable for its beautiful woodlands, its mound and delightful atmosphere, its pure water, its unrivaled healthfulness, and its cultivated and refined society.

When Founded.—The college was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and ceded to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845.

Alumni.—Its Alumni numbers two hundred and three, and they are to be found in the most honorable and useful stations in the land.

Apparatus and Cabinet.—The college possesses a valuable set of Philosophical, Astronomical and Chemical Apparatus, and also a well-selected Mineralogical and Geological Cabinet. The apparatus includes a Tiendolite, Sextant, Compass, Chronometer, Atwood's Machine, Whirling Table, Electrical Machine, Air Pump, various combinations of the Mechanical Powers, Batteries, Chemical Tests, etc., sufficient for a thorough and extended course of observations and experiments. Steps have been taken by the Board of Trustees to put these in thorough repair.

Literary Societies.—There are two regular Literary Societies connected with the institution. These are of great utility to young men acquiring a liberal education—improving them in the art of public speaking, making them in some degree familiar with the proceedings of deliberative bodies, and in cultivating systematic business habits. Each Society has a convenient hall and a well-selected Library—about one thousand six hundred volumes each, which, added to the College Library of two thousand volumes, makes over five thousand volumes in the college.

Buildings.—The Trustees are determined to continue the repairs on the buildings till completed. The grand Center Building is a noble specimen of architectural beauty and adaptation to the purposes of its erection. The wings, built of solid brick, present each a front of two hundred feet, with upper and lower galleries the entire length, supported by Tuscan columns, and with the center making in the perspective a continuous front of seven hundred feet.

Preparatory Department.—In the Preparatory Department students are fitted for regular college classes, or may obtain a thorough English or commercial education.

The Faculty.—His Faculty are men of experience and success in teaching.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE,
STAUNTON, VIRGINIA,

will begin its Twenty-fifth Annual Session SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

REV. W. A. HARRIS, D. D., President, with an able corps of twenty-three teachers and officers. Modern languages taught and spoken by European teachers.—Nine-by-seven professors and teachers, among whom are two of the most cultivated teachers of vocal music in the South.

This is one of the healthiest climates in the world. Its marked effect is the rapid promotion of the physical health and vigor of our pupils. Those who come here from the South, with feeble constitutions, chills and climatic diseases, are entirely restored.

Buildings elegant, fanned by the purest breezes, and commanding the most magnificent rural and mountain scenery, making it one of the most delightful refuge homes in the Union.

The last session one hundred and eleven young ladies attended this school, as boarding pupils, from fifteen Southern States.

Extracts from Testimonials.

From Bishop D. S. Doggett, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, located in Staunton, Virginia, under the presidency of Rev. W. A. Harris, is, in my judgment, one of the best institutions for young ladies in the South. I have occasion to know and appreciate its value by the advantages enjoyed by one of my daughters, now a pupil there. It possesses all the facilities of a thorough female education. Its personal accommodations are all that can be desired for health and comfort or taste. No location could be more eligible, no scenery more magnificent, no atmosphere more salubrious. It is now in a state of great prosperity. I do not hesitate to recommend it to the patronage of all who wish their daughters to receive the benefits of a useful and ornamental culture.

D. S. DOGGETT.

From Bishop E. M. Marvin, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute is an honor to the church. Instruction is thorough. All classes stand high. Its music advantages are offered of a very high order. The most talented professors are employed, and neither pains nor expense are spared to make this department eminent. The school is very prosperous, and deserves to be so.

E. M. MARVIN.

From Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, deserves the brilliant success it enjoys. It has a good corps of teachers, a beautiful situation and excellent management. Having had a daughter under Mr. Harris' care during the present session, my observation leads me to believe this school to be one of the best of female seminaries which adorn our State.

CLARKSVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY,
CLARKSVILLE, TENN.

The next session begins AUGUST 31. A full corps of experienced teachers, every department well furnished, ample grounds, excellent boarding arrangements and thorough training give us many advantages.

Clarksville is remarkable for its health. The Memphis Appeal says: "The city of Clarksville is one of the most delightful places in the Union, occupying, as it does, a romantic and healthy site, and possessing a community noted for its social elegance, culture and morality."

Bishop McTyeire said to one of the trustees: "Bro. Wright takes to teaching con amore. He pursues it conscientiously, and what is so done is thoroughly done."

Bishop Paine said in a District Conference: "I have known Bro. J. M. Wright for several years, and I most cordially congratulate the friends and patrons of Clarksville Female Academy on securing him as its President, believing that his education, aptitude to impart instruction and his administrative capacity eminently fit him for that delicate and responsible office."

Scientific.

A PAPER on "Ventilation of Ships," presented by Dr. Rattray, R. N., was read at the meeting of the Medico-Chirurgical Society, and referred to in the London Lancet. He stated that in the "innermost parts" (wherever that may be) of some of "her majesty's" ships 33 volumes of carbonic acid in the 1,000 exist. Parkes tells us that carbonic acid "produces fatal results when the amount reaches from 50 to 100 per 1,000 volumes, and at an amount much below this, 15 or 20 per 1,000, it produces, in some persons at any rate, severe headache." Angus Smith finds "that 30 volumes per 1,000 caused great feebleness of the circulation, with usually slowness of the heart's action; the respirations were, on the contrary, quickened, but were sometimes gasping." And we are told that ammonia from the urine, sulphuretted hydrogen and sulphide of ammonia from the bilge, and other noxious matters, solid and gaseous, are all constantly rising to intensify the mischief.

IN THE YEAR 1861 Mr. Huggins directed his telescope, armed with the spectrum apparatus, to the planetary nebula in Draco. At first he suspected that some derangement of the instrument had taken place, for no spectrum was seen, but only a short line of light, perpendicular to the direction of the dispersion caused by the prism. He found that the light of this nebula, unlike every other celestial light which had yet been subjected to prismatic analysis, was not composed of rays of different refrangibility, as in the cases of the sun and stars, and that therefore it could not form a spectrum. A great part of the light of this nebula consists of but one color, and was seen as a bright line. A more careful examination revealed another line, narrower and much fainter, and a little more refrangible than the brightest line, and separated from it by a dark interval. Beyond this, again, at about three times the distance of the second line, a third exceedingly faint line was seen. The brightest line indicates the presence of ultrogen, the next in brightness barium, and the faintest hydrogen. These few lines show that all the nebulæ are not clusters of stars, but that some of them consist of masses of glowing gas.

SPONTANEOUS MOVEMENTS IN PLANTS.—In the Popular Science Review Mr. Alfred W. Bennett presents an extremely interesting account of the spontaneous motions and irritability observed in the vegetable world, of which the sensitive plant (Mimosa) affords a well-known but by no means a solitary example. One of the commonest and most mysterious of such phenomena is that of the convolution of climbing plants. These, as is notorious, always twine round their support in one direction—that is, always from right to left or from left to right—and always, for the same species, in the same direction. This is manifested when there is no support, or when the end of the growing shoot stands or hangs free from the prop to which the lower portion already clings. When a climbing plant first springs from the ground, the extremity of the shoot performs slow gyrations in the air, as if, as Darwin expresses it, it were searching for a support. This movement, Mr. Bennett says, is spontaneous—that is, it is not the necessary result of known physical laws acting upon the individual. If it were so, individuals of different species, under similar conditions, would turn in the same direction; and individuals of the same species, under different conditions, would follow different directions. Mr. Bennett does not distinctly claim for plants the actual possession of a voluntary or sentient faculty; but he points out that facts do not support the dogma of a clear line of demarkation separating the animal from the vegetable kingdom—the power of voluntary motion belonging to one and not to the other.

A MARKET FOR OLD HATS.—We find the following odd story in the London Academy: "The group of islands known as the Nicobars, situated about one hundred and fifty miles south of the Andamans, has been but little explored, though the manners and customs of the inhabitants of these islands offer very interesting peculiarities to the notice of the ethnologist. One of the most noticeable of these, and one which seriously affects the trade of the island, is the passion for old hats, which, without exception, pervades the whole framework of society. No one is exempt from it. Young and old, chief and subject alike, endeavor to outvie each other in the singularity of shape no less than in the number of the old hats they can acquire during their lifetime. On a fine morning at the Nicobars it is no unusual thing to see the surface of the ocean in the vicinity of the islands dotted over with canoes, in each of which the noble savage, with nothing whatever on but the conventional slip of cloth and a tall white hat with a black band, may be watched standing up and catching fish for his daily meal. Second-hand hats are most in request, new hats being looked upon with suspicion and disfavor. This curious passion is so well known that traders from Calcutta make annual excursions to the Nicobars with cargoes of old hats, which they barter for cocoanuts, the only product of these islands; a good tall white hat with a black band fetching from fifty-five to sixty-five good cocoanuts. Intense excitement pervades the island while the trade is going on, and fancy prices are often asked and obtained. When the hats or the cocoanuts have at length come to an end, the trader generally lands a cask or two of rum, and the whole population in their hats get drunk without intermission until the rum also comes to an end. It is curious that in those far-away regions so profitable a market should be found for cast-off specimens of one of the most disagreeable symbols of civilization.

"The same yearning after better things in a more advanced stage may be observed in Madagascar, where no official is content if he cannot deck himself out in the tarnished plumage of some long-defunct admiral, general or embassador."

A FORTUNE-TELLING adventuress has just been arrested in Baltimore, and her tricks by their success forcibly indicate the weakness of mind of her customers. One witness testified to having at various times paid an aggregate of $600 to have her husband's love restored, and a case of family quarrel came to light where a wife had paid $15 for a preparation to poison her husband, and the husband had given $20 for an antidote. Each prescription was a harmless powder.

RANNEY was a college student who unfortunately could not pronounce the letter R, but used the letter W. Going down town one day, he was witness to a fracas of some sort. Rushing to the society of his college mates, he exclaimed, in tones of great excitement: "Boys, there's a wiot down town!" "A what?" "Why, a wow!" "A what?" "Why, a wumpus—can't you understand anything?"

AGENTS WANTED for new book

"Tell It All"

A Life's Experience in Mormonism. By Mrs. T. B. H. Stenhouse, of Salt Lake City. With an Introduction by Harriet Beecher Stowe. The genuine Autobiography of an educated lady, whose life has been spent in Polygamy. She tells the story of her life—all the mysteries, ceremonies, and deathless of the Saints. It includes the real story of "Eliza Ann—Wife No 19," TOLD IN FULL BY HERSELF. Complete in detail, climax in style, "stranger than fiction, more thrilling than romance." IT IS THE ONLY GENUINE BOOK upon the subject EVER WRITTEN BY A REAL MORMON WOMAN. Endorsed by Governors, Chief-Justices, Judges, Bishops, Clergy, and eminent women, as of wonderful interest, truthful told, and needed. CAUTION. All other books professing to be written by Mormon women are humbugs. See that your book contains Mrs. Stenhouse's Introduction. 100,000 will be sold. Outfit ready. Full particulars, testimony, terms, etc. sent free. EXCELSIOR PUBLISHING CO., St. Louis, Mo.

TO THE SUFFERERS

WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this dreadful disease, with this medicine; and, what astonishes most, the patient recovered by the use of a single bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not recover by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not afflicted with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

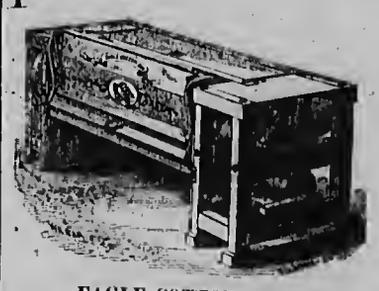
IMPROVED



EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the seventeenth instant:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	830
Mobile		635
Total		1,468

On Saturday the demand was confined to two or three buyers, who were unable to find the kinds wanted, and there was very little done until toward the close, when two lots for 410 and 130 bales changed hands. Under the circumstances nothing transpired indicating any quotable change in prices, nor was the tenor of the dispatches calculated to have any sensible influence. The principal feature of the market was its extreme dullness. The sales summed up 640 bales. On Monday the demand continued limited, the business, which embraced 500 bales, being done by only four buyers, two of whom took more than four-fifths of the whole; and, with so little competition, factors were compelled either to forego sales or meet the demand freely. At the same time many of them were quite stringent in their pretensions, when they predicated on the light supply, and asked outside rates. Strict ordinary, high style, sold at 13¾c., and good ordinary at 14¼c. On Tuesday we noticed only a limited inquiry, and mostly from buyers who claimed concessions, which factors would not admit. The market was consequently extremely dull throughout the day, and the sales were confined to 10 bales. Nothing transpired to indicate any quotable change in prices, but sales could not have been forced unless at a decline.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 1,200 bales, against 1,000 for the corresponding time last week and 1,900 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,212,316 bales, against 1,220,564 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 230,749 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 113,189 to France, of 115,574 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 34,300 to Great Britain. We quote:

Advertisers' Directory

OF THE

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to, or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

MEDICAL.

DR. C. M'LANE'S CELEBRATED LIVER PILLS,

LIVER COMPLAINT,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increase on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder-blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for a rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. M'LANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them A FAIR TRIAL.

P. S. Dealers and Physicians ordering from others than Fleming Bros. will do well to write their orders distinctly, and take none but Dr. C. M'Lane's Liver Pills, prepared by Fleming Bros., Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of base imitations. To those wishing to give them a trial, we will forward per mail, post paid, to any part of the United States: one box of

VOL. 20. NEW ORLEANS, THURSDAY, JULY 30, 1874. NO. 31.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 22.—San Francisco has donated $20,000 to the Louisiana sufferers. The last installment of $4,000 was forwarded to-day.

PHILADELPHIA, July 22.—The mayor has issued a proclamation offering a reward of $20,000 for the capture of the abductors of the child, Charley Brewster Ross, and the restoration of the child.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 22.—The commission appointed by the President to devise a plan for the reclamation and preservation of the overflowed lands along the lower Mississippi river met in Newport to-day and held an informal meeting for consultation. All the members were present.

GALVESTON, July 22.—A special to the News from San Antonio says:

"A letter from Fort Sill, dated the sixteenth instant, states that on the fourteenth the wood camp of Mr. Evans, thirteen miles from the fort, was attacked by Indians.

"A small detachment of United States troops followed them and compelled them to abandon about sixty head of cattle. The body of a white man was found, scalped and full of arrows."

MOBILE, July 23.—The telegram of Tuesday, derived from what was believed a reliable source, was erroneous. Instead of the hail and army worm having destroyed three large plantations in middle Alabama within three days, they have done but little or no damage as yet.

NEW YORK, July 21.—Nassau advices to the twentieth state that the Pacific Mail Company's steamer City of Guatemala, from New York for Aspinwall, was lost on the northeast point of Watling Island, Bahamas, on the sixteenth instant, at midnight. All hands were saved.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 25.—A dispatch from Eureka gives the particulars of a storm yesterday. It had been raining with great violence till noon, when a cloud burst on a lofty range of mountains to the east, and a vast volume of water washed down to where the town is located. The eastern part of the town was flooded in ten minutes by a fearful wash of water, which constantly increased in violence, depth and impetuosity.

The people were hemmed in. At every moment houses were torn from their foundations and swept away with the occupants. Ropes were procured and a line was formed. Brave men, thus protected, dashed into the surging torrent and saved many lives; only a few women and children were lost.

Roger Robinett, porter of the Sentinel, is among the lost. The Sentinel office was swept away. Bodies are being brought to the courthouse as fast as recovered.

Ninety houses were swept away, and all that part of the town in which are situated the dance-houses and other places of amusement.

The flood only lasted half an hour. It is believed that the total loss of life is from twenty-five to thirty persons.

WASHINGTON, July 25.—A dangerous counterfeit on the five-dollar notes of the Traders' National Bank of Chicago having appeared, the treasury offer one-half per cent. premium for the return of the genuine five-dollar notes of that bank to the department for destruction. The notes should be strapped separately and may be included in packages of national bank notes returned to the treasurer for redemption, and may be returned at the expense of the government.

All genuine five-dollar notes of this bank should hereafter be refused, and the notes of that denomination will thus be driven out of circulation. No more of these notes will be issued by the controller of the currency to that bank.

The attention of bank officers is specially called to the necessity of promptly retiring these notes, which will entirely prevent the circulation of counterfeits.

GALVESTON, July 25.—The first merchantable bale of cotton of the new crop was received to-day from Indianola, per steamship Hutchinson, shipped by William Housman, of Cuero, for account of Mrs. M. Housman, Meyersville, DeWitt county, Texas, to Messrs. Ferke, Wilkins & Co.; weight, four hundred and forty-two pounds, classed low middling, and bought by Heidenheimer Bros. at auction, in the Cotton Exchange to-day, at noon, for twenty-seven cents per pound. This is the third successive year that Mrs. Housman has sent in the first bale.

LOUISVILLE, July 25.—A special to the Courier-Journal says: "One stroke of lightning killed six persons in Woodford county, Kentucky, last night, viz.: Mr. Mundy and wife, Mr. Black, wife and daughter, and a colored man living in the same house. During the same storm the lightning struck many points in central Kentucky, in one instance burning a barn to the ground."

PITTSBURG, July 27.—Heavy showers all day yesterday, but at night the rain fell in a deluge. Fearful loss of life is reported in Alleghany. The tunnel of the Pan-Handle railroad was flooded with four feet of water, it being impossible for the trains to pass. The torrent from the hills swept houses from their foundations, tearing them to pieces. The loss of life is estimated at fifty. Thus far sixteen bodies have been recovered.

PITTSBURG, July 28.—Details of the flood show that the disaster is greater than supposed.

Fully two hundred lives were lost. The damaged district is twenty-five miles in diameter. The prevailing theory is that a water-spout of some kind did the mischief.

NEW YORK, July 28.—Theodore Tilton was arrested on a civil action for libel to-day at the suit of one Gaynor, taken before Judge Walsh, and released on his own recognizance to appear to-morrow. Gaynor claims to be an interested party, and brought suit to compel the production of all the facts. His action is regarded as a movement to bring the case into the courts.

NEW YORK, July 28.—The Commercial says: "The Rothschilds and their associates have been awarded the five per cent. loan, and now have charge of $168,000,000 of the $179,000,000 recently placed."

WASHINGTON, July 28.—The board of engineers recently appointed by the President, under an act of Congress, passed at its last session, to devise a plan for reclaiming the overflowed lands of the Mississippi river, met at Newport, Rhode Island, on the twenty-first instant.

The board was in session several days, deliberating on the various proposed plans of reclamation. It distributed the duties of the members as follows:

To ex-Governor Hebert was assigned the district of Louisiana; to Captain Benyard the district of Mississippi, and to Colonel J. E. Sickles the district of Arkansas and Missouri.

To General H. L. Abbott was assigned the duty of investigating the course and effect of the flood of 1874 as compared with previous floods.

To General Warren was assigned the duty of collecting all information now in the department bearing on the question.

The board adjourned subject to the call of the president, which will be made so soon as the reports come in from the various States. It will be prepared to make its recommendations at an early day in the next session of Congress.

Generals Warren, Abbott and Hebert are probably more familiar with the levee question, in all its phases, than any other three men in the country, except probably the distinguished chief of engineers, General Humphreys.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, July 25.—A special from Berlin says it is reported that the German government is making strenuous exertions to stop the supplies, weapons and money being furnished the Carlists, and has called the attention of the Versailles government to the subject.

BERLIN, July 25.—The North German Gazette says: "The German squadron, now off Rye, England, has been ordered to cruise off the northern coast of Spain. These orders were given in consequence of the shooting of Captain Schmidt, a German newspaper correspondent, and other German subjects by the Carlists."

MADRID, July 26.—A terrible landslip occurred at Allara, in the province of Navarre. Overhanging rocks fell upon and utterly destroyed a village.

The disaster was so sudden that few of the inhabitants escaped. Two hundred corpses have already been recovered.

VIENNA, July 26.—The shock from an earthquake was felt here to-day. A violent storm of rain and hail is reported on the border of Moravia.

MADRID, July 28.—The morning papers say that the Spanish government sent a strongly-worded note to Versailles on the subject of the Carlist violation on the frontier.

A BIBLE SOCIETY IN BRAZIL.—We call special attention to the following, which affords ground to anticipate a good work of Bible distribution in the large and important empire of Brazil. It is a translation from the Imprensa Evangelica, with which we have been favored by the Rev. Dr. Kidder, of Drew Theological Seminary:

"On the sixth of April, 1874, a public meeting was held in Rio de Janeiro for the purpose of organizing a Brazilian Bible Society, auxiliary to the American Bible Society. After full discussion a constitution was adopted, stating the object of the society to be the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, and making provision for membership, officers and the transaction of business. Subscription for membership was then commenced, and on the next day the following officers were elected: Dr. Miguel Vieira Ferreira, president; Dr. C. M. Gruel, W. R. Cassels, C. J. Mesquita, vice presidents; Dr. F. J. Lemos, Rev. A. L. Blackford, secretaries; F. C. S. da Silva, treasurer; Possidonio Martins do Mendonca, solicitor.

"Referring to this interesting event the Imprensa Evangelica, of Rio de Janeiro, says: 'The importance of the work which this association undertakes to promote cannot fail to impress every good man. Every inhabitant of Brazil, interested in the future of the country, ought to contribute what he can toward the dissemination of the word of God among the people. Not only the salvation of souls, but the welfare of society and the prosperity of the entire nation depend on the knowledge of the gospel. We therefore request our friends in the provinces to organize auxiliary societies as extensively as they can, in accordance with one of the provisions of the constitution. When this cannot be done friends of the enterprise may enroll themselves as members of the central society in the capital by correspondence with the treasurer or secretaries.'"

ÆSTIVATION.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM, BY MY LATE LATIN TUTOR.

In candent ire the solar splendor flames,
The folies, languescent, pend from arid rames,
His humid front the cive, subtellor, wipes,
And dreams of erring on ventiferous ripes.

How dulce to vive occult to mortal eyes,
Dorm on the herb with none to supervise;
Carp the suave berries from the crescent vine,
And bibe the flow from longlecundate kine.

For me, alas! no verdurous visions come,
Save yon exiguous pool's conferva-scum;
No concave vial repeats the tender hue
That laves my milk-jug with celestial blue.

Me wretched! Let me curr to quercine shades.
Effund your albid hausts, lacuferous maids;
Oh! might I vote to some umbrageous clump,
Depart, be off—excede, evade, erumpi!

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

A City of the Dead.

One of the most striking and interesting sights in China is the death cities inhabited by the dead only. They are usually situated a few miles from the living ones, and have no parallel that I know of anywhere. I shall essay to convey an idea of the one outside of Canton, which I visited in company of a friend thoroughly versed in Chinese matters. It presented at first sight the appearance of any other Chinese city, with the exception of the dead silence, dearth of movement, and a sort of atmosphere which felt vapid and stagnant. There were the same narrow streets paved with the cobble-stones, and the same quaint little square houses with the elaborate screen in the doorway instead of a door, the little latticed Venetian window-frames whence the Chinese woman satisfies her curiosity as to what is going on in the outer world. But here no eyes peeped through, no figures glided in and out from behind the screen, no pattering feet of bearer coolies smoothed the cobble-stones, no cry of vendor of fruit and fish broke the dull monotony. The streets intersected each other, and ran in crooked zigzags, as most Chinese streets do. Here and there were patches of garden ground planted with cadaverous, sapless flowers, looking as though they had been struck with paralysis. A few dwarfed shrubs stood languidly up, seeming as though they could not put forth more than one leaf in a century. There was no hum of insects or flies, not even the ubiquitous musquito. Not as much as a rat ran cross the silent streets, which we traversed for some time, experiencing with terrible acuteness the irksome jar of our own footfall.

My companion suggested that we should enter one of the houses; we therefore stepped behind the screen and found ourselves in an ordinary Chinese parlor or receiving-room, furnished with the usual black ebony chairs and teapoys, with the quaint gaudy pictures lacking perspective, which one might fancy are hung in sheer perversity perpendicularly instead of horizontally, commencing at the ceiling and extending to the floor in a narrow strip, the figures appearing on various stages as upon a ladder. At one end of the room was the altar, which adorns the principal apartment of every Chinese house, sustaining some ferocious-looking joss, which represents either saint or demigod. On either side were brass urns containing smoldering incense, and in the front cups of tea and samshoo. I do not know if the tea was hot. I did not taste it, for if it is ill to step in dead men's shoes, it must be worse to drink dead men's tea. In the center of the room was a bulky article which looked like an ottoman or divan covered with a quilted silk counterpane or mastody, such as is used on Chinese beds, and it might have passed for one of those most uncomfortable articles of furniture. But it was hollow, and within it lay the inhabitant of the dwelling, sleeping his last long sleep—never more to rise; never more to sip his tea or samshoo, though it waited there prepared for him; never to sit on his ebony chairs; never to light any more joss-stick to his ancestors, but have them lit for him by his posterity. There were other chambers in the house similarly furnished, except that the mastody was thrown back, and displayed an empty coffin, which lay ready lined with sandal wood, its owner not being yet dead. The veranda was furnished with the usual green porcelain seats and vases in which seemed to stagnate the bloodless flowers. We stole softly out into the street, chilled and painfully yet not mournfully impressed. We went into the next door; that house was "To Let Unfurnished." A third was rich in gilding and vermilion, and mirrors reflected and glittered through the rooms. The ebony and ivory furniture was most beautifully carved. The tea and samshoo cup were of exquisite egg-shell china; objets de verta lay about on the altar emblazoned with real jewels. The bed was covered with a magnificent crimson velvet quilt, richly embroidered in gold and seed pearls, with a deep bullion fringe worth its weight in gold. Under the quilt lay a high mandarin who had amassed an enormous fortune by the very simple process of chopping off the heads of all such as he discovered to be possessed of money. I was informed that he had immense money with him in his coffin, and was adorned with all his jewels and costly mandarin dress.

The coffin or state-bed on which he lay had cost one thousand pounds. The outer one was of ebony, beautifully inlaid with gold, silver, ivory and mother-of-pearl. The inner case was of the famous iron-wood from Borneo or Burmah, considered more invulnerable than metal, as it neither rusts nor decays, and defies the white ant. Within that there was a sandal wood shell lined with velvet, the body being highly spiced to preserve it. The furniture of the house might well exceed a thousand pounds. The altar cloth and hangings were of rich embroidered silk, with a profusion of gold fringe, and the lattice filigree, which the Chinese are so fond of introducing everywhere, was gilt and vermilion. The floor was inlaid marble.—Temple Bar.

Oliver Cromwell.

Literary sycophants have been accustomed to revile the character of Cromwell, and to represent him as a low-born, vulgar hypocrite or bigot. He had not the parlor graces of Lord Chancellor Hatton, but he would have walked alone through an army of Hattons as an ox walks through a field of grasshoppers.

Born of an ancient family, descended from some of the high nobility, he was related to Thomas Cromwell, the Earl of Essex, and some time minister to Henry the Eighth. His grandfather was Sir Henry Cromwell, the Lord of Hinch-Inbrook, known as the "Golden Knight," on account of his great riches; and his mother was of the best of English blood, and her relationship to James the First induced that monarch, on his way to take possession of the English crown, to become a guest at the Cromwell mansion, where Oliver, then but four years old, saw the king at the family table, James little dreaming that the head of his own son would be cut off by this kindred boy, who should reign in his stead.

He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and when but eighteen years old he was called home, by the death of his father, to be the sole protector of his mother and sisters.

While reading law in London, at the age of twenty, he fell in love with Elizabeth, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Sir James Bourchier, a wealthy knight. At the age of twenty-one he married, and under the same roof with his mother took his young bride, who afterward, coming to her exalted station, showed a purity and nobleness of character more beautiful than her personal loveliness. She was the first and only love of Cromwell, and in the height of his greatness and near the end of his reign, when necessity had separated them for a short time, she, like a true and loving woman, chided him for not writing oftener; and to her chidings he replied: "My beloved wife, you scold me in your letters because, by my silence, I appear to forget you. Truly it is I who ought to complain, for I love you too much. Thou art dearer to me than all the world."

He was in Parliament at the age of twenty-nine, and again at the age of forty; and when the civil war broke out he raised two companies of soldiers, at his own expense, and devoted his entire estate to the public service.

And when he came to power the haughtiest kings and nobles of Europe sought political and matrimonial alliance. At his death the court of France went into mourning, though he had required Louis the Fourteenth to banish the sons of Charles, whose widow was Henrietta of France, the daughter of Henry the Great. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, as a legal monarch, beside the anointed kings.

There was a time when all seemed lost of the liberties of England, and Cromwell thought of leaving his country. But in those trying times, when all good men began to despair, Cromwell and the just men who sympathized with him "sought the Lord in prayer;" and it was "his guidance," as they believed, to gird on their swords for war and rescue England from her slavery, and from that hour they never faltered and they never feared. Prince Rupert, the nephew of Charles, was accustomed with his gay troopers to carry all before him by his dashing onsets. At the battle of Marston Moor he led twenty thousand eager Royalists, and for the first time he dashed against the "Ironsides" of Cromwell. It was like the dash of sea-foam against a granite mountain. After the battle Cromwell wrote to his wife: "God made them as stubble to our swords."

When in the plenitude of his power young Lely, afterward the court painter of the frail beauties of the Second Charles, wanted to paint him. "Paint me as I am," said Cromwell. "If you leave out the scars and wrinkles I will not pay you a shilling." Go to the Pitti Palace—the picture with the scars and the wrinkles you shall see; but a kinglier head reposed on kinglier shoulders you shall never see.—Hon. Edwards Pierrepont.

IN ITS own sphere power is greater than suffering; but in this sphere suffering is greater than power. Power creates; suffering cannot create. Power provides; suffering cannot provide. But can power redeem? Oh, no! it is suffering, and suffering only, that redeems. Power can illuminate the obscure constitution; suffering cannot do that. But can power correct the perverted character? Oh, no! suffering, and suffering alone, can do that. Power, like the lightning, strikes a single object; suffering, like the cloud, baptizes the world with its tears, and bends the rainbow of peace over mountains all rustling with thanksgiving, and valleys of silent beauty all sparkling with praise.—Thomas H. Stockton.

The Pope and Universal Suffrage.

The Pope has lately blessed two sets of heavy-laden and self-denying pilgrims—one set having come to him by weary stages in luxurious cars from France, and the other set in the form of an ocean picnic party from the United States. To both of these parties the pontiff gave his blessing, but its form was so different to the different recipients that, if by any mistake the one intended for the French pilgrims had been pronounced upon those from America, the latter might have been inclined to consider it a curse rather than a blessing. In blessing the French pilgrims the Pope used the following language:

"I bless them finally in the end (allow me to say so) of seeing them employed in the difficult work of causing the disappearance, if it is possible, or at least of diminishing a horrible wound which afflicts human society, and which is called universal suffrage. Yes, this is a wound destructive of social order, and which would justly deserve to be called universal falsehood."

Do American Roman Catholics indorse the idea of the Pope that universal suffrage is a horrible wound to human society and that it deserves to be called "universal falsehood? What would become of them and their influence in the United States if universal suffrage should be extirpated from our institutions?

Possibly, however, the announcement of the Pope should be taken with important limitations. It may be that when he made it he exercised some mental reservation, as is characteristic of the papacy. Perhaps his meaning was that there should be no suffrage save to Roman Catholics, and that, only when exercised by Protestants, it is a horrible wound to society and a universal falsehood.

In either case the Pope's statement of political principles with reference to the suffrage is not likely to find many open advocates in the United States. If carried out to the letter his principles would be destructive of the power of his followers here, since there can be little doubt that if the suffrage is restricted within narrower limits his ignorant co-religionists would be among the first to suffer its loss; while, on the other hand, the attempt to limit its exercise to themselves would precipitate the religious conflict of which many think this country is destined to be the arena—the old conflict between Protestants and freedom of thought and conscience on the one side, and the adherents of the papacy and religious slavery on the other, in which the watchword of the former would be: "The open Bible and common schools for the people;" and that of the latter: "Down with the Bible and the common schools!"—Christian Intelligencer.

Christianity in Greenland.

The recent consecration in Copenhagen, by the Lutheran Church, of the first native Greenlander as a missionary to that ice-bound country, has caused the New York Times to publish the following historic reflections: "Among the wild colonists who worshiped the vigorous deities of the Norse mythology, Christianity was introduced about the year 1000 through the efforts of a king of Norway, who had been in the habit of journeying through his kingdom, attended both by priests and berserkers, and who let loose the latter on such hardened persons as were not affected by the arguments of the former. The founder, however, of Christianity in Greenland appears to have been a humane pirate, for he earned the name of 'The Happy,' both from the cheerful hopes he derived from his faith, and from his having gone out of the way to do the unusual action, in that age, of saving some shipwrecked mariners.

"An interesting fact to us, as connected with the first Christianization of Greenland, is that the sagas place the first discovery of "Vinland," or what is supposed to be America, by the Greenland colonists at this date, and by this very Leif, 'The Happy,' who had converted the settlers of Greenland. No impartial scholar can read these sagas carefully without coming to the conclusion that these daring rovers from the Norse vikings did, in some of their bold voyages, strike on the coasts of our Eastern States.

"For some four or five centuries we have accounts in the Norse sagas of the colonies and the Church of Greenland. A Bishop even was sent out from Norway in 1122, but gradually the wide and tempestuous seas, and perhaps a growing severity of climate, separated this little colony and church from all knowledge or intercourse with the civilized world. A pestilence also appears to have desolated the country, and the Esquimaux attacked and plundered the unhappy colonists. Some few notices of them appear as late as 1494 in the Danish records. But finally all traces of the settlement or the church disappeared.

"It was not till 1733 that the ruins of old Icelandic and Norwegian farm-houses and churches were first discovered, and it was then seen that the poetic sagas rested on a historic foundation.

"It was in the latter part of the eighteenth century that the first converts among the Esquimaux of Greenland were made by the Danish missionaries. It is the first fruits of these long labors of education and religion that a few weeks since an Esquimaux convert was consecrated, amid the imposing ceremonies of the Lutheran Church in Copenhagen, to go forth a native missionary, versed in European acquirements, among his countrymen of that wintry land. Civilization will not again be allowed to perish in those icy regions, as it has done in the past, for the Danish settlements on that coast are necessary, both for the important business of whale fishery and for the practical settlement of the great question of a Northwest passage. The Christian church will, no doubt, survive and scatter its seed even among the degraded Esquimanx of those Northern regions."

Christian Self-Denial.

The Rev. John Venn, in preaching the anniversary sermon before the Church Missionary Society of Great Britain, presented the following instances of self-denying Christian charity:

"About thirty years ago a young person in my own parish met with an accident by which her spine was injured; and from that time till her death, five months ago, she never left her bed. She often suffered much pain, and could only lie on one side. For thirty years I never remembered seeing her except lying in one position and on one spot. But soon after her accident she became acquainted with Christ and his unsearchable riches, and could bless God for her afflictions. About seventeen years ago one of the native pastors of Sierra Leone was visiting me, and I took him to see her. She became deeply interested in the cause of missions, and from that time till her death she kept up a correspondence with him, and almost every year sent him for his people a box with books and articles of clothing, etc., often to the value of more than twenty pounds. She had no money to buy these things herself; but she could work with her needle, though sometimes not without pain, and she had many friends who visited her or corresponded with her, with whom she pleaded the cause of Africa. Many were the tears which were shed by this pastor and his people when it was known that their benefactress was dead, for there was not a house in his parish, as he once said, where her name was not known and blessed.

"I once met with a poor cripple in the Forest of Dean, who broke stones upon the road, and for years that man gave upon an average five or six pounds to various religious societies. He gave up a comfortable cottage, inherited from his father, and took up his abode in a wretched hovel in which he was allowed to live for nothing (he was unmarried,) in order that he might let his cottage, and give the rent of it to the cause of Christ. In that wretched hovel his long winter evenings were cheered by his Bible, and by the annual reports of the societies to which he subscribed.

"The late Dr. Marshman, that laborious missionary, 'died,' we are told by his son, 'in graceful poverty,' after having devoted a sum little short of forty thousand pounds to the mission, and that not in one ostentatious sum, but through a life of privations. In a private letter, written a few years before his death, he said: 'God has made my wife and me (he was referring to their boarding schools) the humble instruments in his hands of contributing thirty thousand pounds to his cause; and how much happier I feel than I should if I had this sum in the funds or in landed property I cannot tell. I have never had a misgiving thought for having done it, though I have two sons unprovided for.'"

Deposed!

Bishop Cummins is deposed!

The charge against him was that "he had abandoned the communion of the church." No notice was taken of his perfectly courteous resignation; no recognition was made of his right of withdrawal from the church, which our civil law secures to every man. He was thrust out, and, as far as could be by a form of words, degraded.

The parties to the act were Benjamin Bosworth Smith, who signs himself "bishop of the diocese of Kentucky, and senior bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States," and more than thirty other bishops. The act is done, as is ostentatiously declared, "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

Christian people of the United States will consider that the sacred name of the Trinity is here profaned, as it always is when used to cover a breach of charity. Bishop Cummins has not consorted with base or ungodly men; he has not apostatized from the true faith as it is in Jesus Christ. He has not perverted the gospel or handled it deceitfully. Following his Christian impulses, he has sought a wider Christian fellowship. He has proceeded in such a manner as to secure the good opinion of reasonable men. Whatever may be thought, by those who dissent from him, of the expediency of his proceedings, his right to leave the communion to which he has belonged is unquestionable.

It may be said that the "canons" do not admit of resignation, but require deposition. So much the worse, then, for the canons. They may thrust out a bishop, with attempted circumstances of ignominy, but only to make his fellowship with Christians generally closer and firmer. They cannot alter, by a particle, the judgment of the Christian world. We are of opinion that this act will not benefit the chief actors in it.—New York Methodist.

Two spiders, so the story goes,
Upon a living bent,
Entered the meeting-house one day,
And hopefully were heard to say:
"Here we shall have at least fair play,
With nothing to prevent."

Each chose his place and went to work;
The light webs grew apace;
One on the altar spun his thread,
But shortly came the sexton dread
And swept him off; and so, half dead,
He sought another place.

"I'll try the pulpit next," said he;
"There surely is a prize;
The desk appears so neat and clean,
I'm sure no spider there has been;
Besides, how often have I seen
The pastor brushing flies."

He tried the pulpit; but, alas!
His hopes proved visionary;
With dusting-brush the sexton came
And spoilt his geometric game,
Nor gave him time nor space to claim
The right of sanctuary.

At length, half-starved, and weak and lean,
He sought his former neighbor,
Who now had grown so sleek and round
He weighed the fraction of a pound,
And looked as if the art he'd found
Of living without labor.

"How is it, friend," he asked, "that I
Endure such thumps and knocks,
While you have grown so very gross?"
"'Tis plain," he answered; "not a loss
I've met since first I spun across
The contribution box."

Methodism on the Gulf Coast.

MR. EDITOR: I propose to give you a few items of the history of Methodism on this coast. The first Protestant minister who took up a regular appointment on this coast was Rev. Green Y. McNabb, in 1842, in the town of Biloxi. The Roman Catholic Church held full sway at that time. Bro. McNabb came through much fear for his safety; but, by the earnest solicitations of a few who were Protestants in principle, he preached in their private houses and wherever opportunity offered. About this time a young man named Wesley G. Evans was converted and was licensed to preach. There were a number of wealthy, learned infidels and skeptics settled along the sea board, one of whom said beastingly: "We have planted a rock on this coast that will defy Wesley Evans and his brethren to overturn." They have nearly all gone, but Wesley still fights on; and that beautiful camp ground, the Lord's battle-field, is in the neighborhood of where this boast was made. "I have seen the wicked in great power," etc.

Rodric Seal, Esq., gave him (McNabb) a lot, and the people built a commodious church of logs. He soon organized a little church. Bro. McNabb was returned the next year, which was 1843. This spring the writer attended, with the presiding elder, J. N. Hamill, and others, the first quarterly meeting held on the sea shore. The house would not hold the congregations. God was there in word and power. The word ran and was glorified. There was a neat frame church erected on the same lot. The work of grace went slowly but steadily on. Other denominations began now to venture on the ground and prospered. Of course there was some vacillating and some proselyting; but there were such men as Martin and Gardner, as firm as the Rock of Gibraltar, for they were founded on the Rock Christ Jesus, with their families and others, now in heaven. There were wealthy Methodists having summer residences built along the coast, who assisted in erecting churches and supporting a pastor at Biloxi, Handsboro, Pass Christian and Bay St. Louis. The work went forward, with occasional retrograde and a glorious reaction up to the war between the States. Some of our best people emigrated to other parts of the country at the close of the war. Others died in the faith. All were broken up. Those rich people who had spent their summers here, and aided largely in the support of the gospel, were broken up. The few members left here financially ruined; their churches dilapidated; unable to support a pastor as they knew he ought to be supported; not able to repair their houses of worship. But these self-sacrificing Methodist preachers came to them regularly during all these times that tried men's souls; but there had to be a constant change, for one man could not bear it more than a year, unless he had other resources. By dint of perseverance there has been steady but slow progress.

We now have a substantial church at Moss Point, and a neat one at Ocean Springs, with intelligent membership and congregations. The Sabbath schools are in good condition, both of which were organized only a few years ago. Our house at Biloxi has been so sadly out of repair ever since the war that it has been a source of mortification; but in our great extremity we are being aided by Bro. J. H. Keller, of your city, who has a delightful summer residence at Biloxi. Being anxious to see the church of his choice honorably represented at this delightful summer retreat, he donated lumber to ceil the church, which is now up in place of the fallen plastering. We are expecting that on his return to Biloxi (June 1) the house will be put in the long-needed repair of blinds and painting, recovered and fenced around. We have already received a donation of books and papers from him for our Sunday school at Biloxi.

At Ocean Springs the venerable David Ayers intimated that he intended to have some long-needed additions and repairs to our neat chapel at this place. The writer was on the coast as presiding elder in 1852, and as pastor in 1858, at which time we had a glorious revival. After an absence of fifteen years, in feeble health, worn out by constant travel, I was returned to this health-restoring climate in 1873. We met and were entertained by Bro. W. R. S., so long identified with New Orleans Methodism, who presented us with a check for $500, the price of a cottage house and five lots, of an acre each, for which he refuses to take a lien or personal obligation. As he is able, he still contributes.

We have a number of Presbyterian and Baptist brethren along this coast, without organization or houses of worship; and, seeing that to attempt to divide the support neither one could retain a pastor, they all seem to settle it, without consultation, that all should for the present stress unite to keep up, at least in as respectable a manner as possible, one pastor. The time may return when all denominations can have their own houses and ministers.

We are looking for a gracious time at the Seashore camp meeting, for we believe that this camp ground will be a power for good, and that from this sea shore the fire kindled by McNabb will shine back to the interior, from whence he came, and to the surrounding cities. God speed it on!

Yours, etc., J. NICHOLSON.

God's Questions.

God's strongest and tenderest appeals are in the shape of questions. His weightiest messages of compassion and anxiety come in this form. Here is found the concentration of pungency. Questions usually follow the failure of all other means. It is the most direct method of eliciting information and obtaining a decision. Interrogation may be considered as the culmination of effort. We may be sure God is earnest when he stops to question. It is not surprising, therefore, to find much of the Bible in the form of questions. Considering the greatness of man's fall, his strange perverseness, with the greatness of the Being seeking his recovery, and the greatness of the means used, pointed, searching questions are a natural result. The casual reader will not perceive them, one or more, in almost every paragraph in God's word. In this we find the fullness of the Father's desire and anxiety: "Why will you die?" Like the mother whose soul yearns over the froward boy, having exhausted all other means—all that a mother's love and anxiety could suggest, reaching out her hands, standing in front of exhausted resources—cries out in the extremity of her anguish: "My son, why will you do so?"

Just now, however, among the many thousands, one comes to mind most strangely tender and wonderfully appealing. It is the question of Jesus to Philip: "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" The time was most interesting. It was just before his final departure and in giving his parting words. The hearts of his disciples were troubled. Clouds were gathering upon their sky. It was a favored moment for the enemy. In the midst of the gloom his approach could the more easily be made. In seeking to comfort them Jesus reasserts his divinity: "Let not your hearts be troubled" (on account of my going away.) "Ye believe in God; believe also in me." Believe in me as God; believe in me as ever present, ever strong, ever willing to succor and to help. I leave you for your own good, to prepare a place, that you may be where I am. You know whither I go, and the way ye know, through faith in me as God—through faith in my divinity. But Thomas, as a representative, boldly denies the assertion: "We know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?" Jesus does not upbraid. His voice grows a shade sadder, and intensely appealing. In tender painstaking he reasserts his mission, the spirituality of his kingdom. Thomas, you say you know not the way! I am the way, the truth and the life. No man cometh to the Father but by me. You that hath seen me hath seen the Father, for I am the Father, and from henceforth ye know him and have seen him, because ye have known and have seen me. So careful and painstaking was Jesus. It seems to have been the crowning effort of his life to impress the disciples with his true character. All his resources of plain, earnest, deep-toned speech, all of appealing look were exhausted; and yet it was not enough. "Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us." This must have been a trying moment to the Savior. As mere man, patience must have given way under the pressure. But no; one more and yet higher grade of effort must be made. Argument, plain statements, positive assertions, miracles, all, all fail. As a last resort a question comes. The human eyes of Jesus must have saddened, his lips must have trembled with emotion as he looks at and speaks to Philip. His tears can almost be seen sparkling on his words: "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" For three years, in patience and endurance, in suffering and want, in persecutions and trials, in miracles and power, in speech and in silence, in look and in act, in private and in public, in prayer and in thought; as man and God, as human and divine, as master and servant, as brother and friend—in all that God incarnate could be—had Jesus been with them. And yet Philip, representing others, in this last moment—the soul-subduing hour of his life—in the culmination of his mission, demands a sight, a literal sight, of the Father—demands yet higher proof of the Savior's divinity, as a guarantee of his own faith. "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us." "Have I been so long time with you?" etc. The interrogation cuts to the line. It is a home-thrust. It can't be avoided. In it there is no compromise. It closes up the door of controversy. No room for an answer. It is a strong affirmation. No more queries or demands or denials from the disciples after this.

Oh! there are many Philips to-day. The human heart often makes the same demands, and that, too, in the presence of all the proofs that a kind Father can give; and that, too, in the fullness of his own trouble, longings and bitter hunger. Often is it softened and subdued by the look and question: "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me—and yet dost thou not know me?" How many years has Jesus been with thee, reader?—in how many forms? From the first discernment of sin, in the gracious convictions of his Spirit, in the faith and training of a pious mother, in the counsels of a spiritual father, in the lessons of his word and providences, in sickness and in health, in prosperity and adversity, in sunshine and in shade. In a thousand forms and voices has he been with thee—in the sweet songs of nature, and beaming beauty of flowers, in the grandeur of mountains, and the majesty of old ocean. And yet with all his appeals, softened by his love and emphasized by his power, thou dost not know him—thou dost not love him. Thy faith is not strong and vigorous, and he comes and looks into thy doubting and hesitating heart with this question: "Have I been so long time with thee, and yet hast thou not known me?"

Then let us know Jesus as our Savior—take him to our hearts, the one precious treasure of heaven. Believing in him as we do in God, our hearts will not be troubled. Our eyes will be bright, and our lips will speak joyful words, our steps will be ordered by the Lord, and our meditations inspired by his Spirit. T.

Church Membership.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of the second of July there appeared an article headed "Church Membership," from the facile pen of Bro. S. P. Richardson, in which some strange views are set forth, which, if I understand the writer, are not in harmony with the teachings of Scripture nor Methodist doctrine.

He says: "The church has been deficient in the definition of man's real condition and relation to God;" and then undertakes himself to explain "the true position of man in this respect." In doing this he states that "Adam was created not morally holy, but by creation perfect," and "All the race of Adam are born in Christ, or in grace, or under a dispensation of grace; more properly, all are born in the church, for Christ is the church." The above quotation has the ring of unsound doctrine to my mind. Whether the church has been deficient in explaining man's real condition and relation to God, I leave such authorities as Richard Watson and John Wesley to answer. That Bro. Richardson has failed to give us a better or even as good a definition of the subject, I think there can be no question.

"Adam," he says, "was created not morally holy, but by creation perfect;" and yet the Bible teaches that he was created in the image, after the likeness of God. Holiness, as applied to man, must involve a sinless moral state. Adam was created in such a state; therefore he must have been created holy, as well as perfect. I can see no difference in being by creation perfect, and by creation holy. Holiness and perfection, as applied to man, are the same, or about the same. How, then, could Adam be perfect and not holy? It would be about as difficult as for a man to be born "outside of providence."

In speaking of the descendants of Adam he says: "All are born in Christ," or "in the church, for Christ is the church."

Now Paul teaches: "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature"—that is, he is a Christian, a child of God, by regeneration. Are men born Christians? So far from that, the Bible plainly teaches that we are born into the world in sin—a sinful moral state, entirely so. I like the old expression, "total depravity," there being in us by our natural birth no moral good. We are inclined to evil, and that continually.

Nor do I understand that men are born in the church, either the visible or invisible. If in the invisible, then are they born Christians. But Christ himself plainly teaches: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." That which is born of a sinful nature is a sinful nature. If in the visible church, then is baptism no more the sacrament of initiation into the church. What nonsense in bringing even an infant into the church by baptism when it was already in it—born in it.

Finally, I cannot see how Christ is the church in any good sense. He is the foundation of the church, the chief corner-stone, the head of the church, as the husband is the head of the wife. The relation between the two is close; but still as a man is not a woman, nor a woman a man, so Christ is not the church, nor is the church Christ.

Christ is God, possessing all the communicable and incommunicable attributes of the Father, absolutely, essentially and eternally perfect—a very different being, nature and character from the church, either in heaven or on earth. The church on earth is composed of a great multitude of Adam's fallen children, for whom and in whom, as our great High Priest and Head of the church, he carries on the work of purification until he shall present the church unto himself an holy church, adorned as a bride for her husband, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.

Should we teach that men are born in Christ or in the church, and that Christ is the church, there seems to be but a step into the cardinal error that they are born pure and holy. Then away goes the Bible doctrine of human depravity. And if men are born in Christ, and you will add on the Calvinistic doctrine of the final perseverance of the saints, you will have very good Universalism. I am not a controversialist—do not write to elicit a controversy—but if you should give this to the public I trust it will provoke abler pens than mine on some points here glanced at.

Yours fraternally,

G. HAWKINS.

READE not bookes alone, but men, and amongst them chiefly thyselfe: if thou find anything questionable there, use the commentary of a severe friende rather than the glosse of a sweete-lipt flatterer; there is more profit in a distastefull truth than deceitfull sweetnesse.

A good brother in a Baptist church of Miami county, Indiana, while giving his experience, not long ago, said: "Bretherin, I've been a tryin' this nigh unto forty year to servo the Lord and get rich both at once, and I tell yer it's mighty hard sleddin'!"

Reminiscence of the Past.

MR. EDITOR: In perusing the pages of your excellent paper, now and then my eye lights upon the announcement that such an one has breathed his last and gone to his reward. I close my eyes in sweet meditation, reflecting upon the days of my youth, when I was associated with those men of God in the itinerant field. In the year 1830 I was received into the Mississippi Conference on probation, at the close of which the Alabama Conference was set off; and, as my parents lived in Greene county, Alabama, my lot was cast in that Conference.

This was comparatively the day of small things, and a few men of mature years, and some of them of decided character, entered this interesting field as ministers of the gospel—R. L. Kennon, J. Mellard, E. V. Levert, E. Hearn, T. Boswell, J. Foust and others. These moved off in the front rank, followed by a second class that were assuming decided position, such as H. W. Hilliard, R. Walker, T. Burpo, J. R. Lambuth, T. Abernathy, N. Hopkins, L. Massingale and others. The first of these were generally in charge of districts, the latter on stations and prominent appointments. These were followed by yet another class of inexperienced young men, such as William Wier, C. McLeod, J. Shanks, A. S. Dickinson, T. Moody, A. Shank, William A. and Robert Smith, twin brothers, Pilley, Jones, Ramsey, Crowson and others. These were scattered over that interesting field, on large circuits, generally four weeks, two together. Among this band of determined men your humble correspondent found a place, the recollections of which he will cherish as long as memory holds her seat. The country was new, and, being rapidly populated, the people were kind and hospitable. These men felt that they were called to the work of the ministry, and with cheerful hearts and willing minds they went to their fields of toil, and through their instrumentality the foundation was laid for the rich harvest of souls that has since been gathered into the garner.

Where are the men that then lived and labored in that widespread field, from Pensacola to the mountains, from the Chattahoochee to the Tombigbee? A very few of them still linger upon the shores of time, waiting their summons and sweetly anticipating their reward.

How vivid in my recollection are some of the incidents that occurred in those days. About the year 1827 I listened to a sermon preached by Rev. R. L. Kennon, near Eutaw, on Sabbath morning, at eleven o'clock A. M. The subject was the fullness of the atonement. As he neared the conclusion of his subject he dwelt upon the objectionable and dangerous features of Calvinism. An intelligent old gentleman of that school was sitting near the altar. Times grew so warm that he attempted to get out of hearing. He would move a few paces, stop and listen, and the point was about disposed of before he reached his desired distance. At the conclusion of that sermon the vast crowd were in a perfect state of commotion. Such excitement is rarely witnessed. As a preacher R. L. Kennon had but few equals, and scarcely any superiors. He lives in the memory of those who knew him.

About the year 1828 I listened to a sermon preached by E. V. Levert, at a camp meeting held near Tuskaloosa. The subject was the torments of the damned, founded upon Revelations xiv, 10, 11. It was delivered at three o'clock on Sabbath evening. There was a large crowd. As he approached the conclusion of his sermon the place seemed to grow dark, and for a time all was still as death. Presently shrieks for mercy commenced, mourners were called, and it seemed to the writer that half of the congregation were on their knees or prostrate on the ground, crying for mercy—such a jargon of sounds that one could scarcely distinguish anything. The excitement continued until between midnight and daylight of the following morning, resulting in a large number of happy converts.

After forty-five years of experience in the ministry, if I were again young and called to this work, and had my choice, I would say: "Give me a good horse, saddle and bridle, saddlebags and books, and send me to a comparatively new country, upon a four weeks' circuit or mission." Oh, how I should like to traverse the fields of the far West, where they cry in such pathetic strains for the word of life! My days, however, are well-nigh numbered, yet I find many things to cheer and comfort. Here and there are green spots and cheerful scenes, affording consolation even in old age. J. MATTHEWS.

"We" or I?

MR. EDITOR: I rises to a point of order or of taste, as you like. He has been entirely ignored by several of your correspondents, and "we" has been honored by them beyond reason—or taste. I have read several articles, over the signatures of individuals, in which I has not been permitted once to show his head, while "we" acts a conspicuous part in almost every sentence. This is unfair. I has personal rights as well as "we," and I hope you will admit his plea. With your permission, I will act as his attorney. Suppose the correspondence was private, how would it look to put forward that officious "we"—as, e. g., "We would have answered your letter," etc.—and sign John Smith? Has I a less claim to public notice than private? Editors use the we editorially, but not when they use a signature. Now, sir, I object to this illegitimate employment of "we," and protest against I's being robbed of his rights. But lest this argument should be treated among the we's as merely the opinion of one of the I's—an interested party—I would like to have your editorial we to decide the question. Which do you say—"We" or I?

Obituaries.

MRS. CHARLOTTE SIMPSON was born July 17, 1821, and died of hemorrhage of the stomach, November 12, 1872. Sister Simpson was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1835. She was married to Josiah Simpson in 1844, and leaves six daughters, all members of the church, to mourn her loss. Having been raised by pious parents, she early learned to love her Maker. She lived an exemplary life, and died trusting in the blessed Savior. She left the society of her family and friends to go and dwell with her elder brother. Her example should influence us to be prepared to do the same. May God help us. A FRIEND.

DIED, at Pattersonville, Louisiana, July 9, 1874, JULIA C. CURTIS, consort of James M. Muggah, deceased, in the fiftieth year of her age. She was born in Canton county, Virginia. Her life was spent in perpetual usefulness—ministering to the weak and nursing the sick—until at last the mocking touch of consumption traced furrows on her brow, changing active to tottering steps. Then for weary months she lay languishing on a bed of pain, until death came in calmly, and touched her so gently, softly, sweetly, that the brow was again smooth and cleared of all furrows, the heart of all its pain. So gently passed her spirit home that we scarcely feel it death; but the reality in its work is severe to bear by her daughters and friends left to feel the vacancy she leaves behind. Friends, near, and some far away, who perchance have forgotten her kindness in days gone by, sigh not for the weary soul set free. Shed no tear for her who longed and prayed to go, but spare and give them to the living.

L. W.

DIED, of bronchitis, in Wilcox county, Alabama, JULIA ELNORA CURTIS, who was born in North Carolina, September 3, 1836; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of nineteen; was married to Dr. C. C. Curtis April 29, 1857, and died June 25, 1874.

Sister Curtis was confined to her room and bed for more than two years; and although she suffered much, yet she murmured not, but with Christian resignation and fortitude—which was shown by her always smiling countenance—she meekly submitted to the will of God, trusting that her afflictions were working out for her "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory at God's right hand."

My duty as a pastor often called me to her bedside. I always found her very cheerful and anxious to talk of the religion that made her soul happy. For several weeks before she died she was fully conscious that her days were numbered, and, feeling prepared for the final issue, she tried almost daily to prepare her only two living and affectionate sons and her devoted husband for the separation that would soon take place, giving them counsel and encouragement to press toward the "mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

A few hours before she died she expressed a great anxiety to leave this world for her home in heaven. She asked her husband to pray for her to die immediately; but human nature would not allow him to pray for the dearest of earth's ties to be severed from him. He exclaimed: "Wife, how can I?" Then with an air of surprise she said: "Doctor, do you think it is wrong for you to pray for me to pass away to Jesus?" Then she requested all who were with her to sing. "Yes," said she, "sing me right into heaven." The last words she uttered were: "Heaven is my home;" then one short breath and she crossed over the river.

Thus passed away our much-loved sister, who for nineteen years lived a deeply pious and devoted Christian, growing in that grace to her latest hour in life, which enabled her to pass through the pearly gates into the "sunlit city of the New Jerusalem." A. C. HUNDLEY.

W. H. POWELL, the subject of this memoir, was born in Southampton county, Virginia, October 15, 1846, and died in Yazoo county, Mississippi, March 8, 1874.

His stay with us has been indeed brief. He is now in the bosom of the cold grave, having been conquered and laid there by the monster whose ferocity no mortal can resist or overcome. Death hath claimed him as his victim; and while we are satisfied of the decomposition of the body, and its return to the dust of which it was formed, yet equally sure are we that his spirit has flown to the climes of celestial bliss and glory. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church from his infancy, having been baptized into the church at that time; but, like a great many others, he failed for a number of years to live a consistent Christian. He was converted at a protracted meeting held at Wesley chapel, North Warren circuit, in the summer of 1869 or 1870—I do not remember which. This much, however, I do know: that his conversion was sound and genuine; but, like a great many young converts, he neglected his secret religious duties, and as a natural consequence glided gradually back into the beaten path of sin and folly. This, however, is the dark side of the picture. Last year, when the Spirit of God was making decided and unmistakable demonstrations in the way of convicting sinners and reclaiming backsliders, he was one of the many who were reclaimed on that ever-memorable occasion. The meeting to which we now refer was conducted by our faithful brother, Ira B. Robertson.

We have strong hope, and feel assured from the fortitude with which he endured the pangs of death's resistless hand, that his spirit has been wafted to the glory-land. For this hope we are indebted to him from whom we receive all precious gifts, and who does all things well. May the God of hope strengthen us, and may we henceforth go forward constantly exulting in hope of meeting those sacred ties that have preceded us to the grave. May we derive much comfort from the soul-cheering injunction "that all things work together for good to those who love the Lord." C. A. POWELL.

DIED, at his residence, FRANCIS MARION HORTEN, son of L. M. and M. J. Horton, of Newton county, Mississippi. He was born A. D. 1846, and was converted to God and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South under the ministration of the Rev. Silas H. Cox, then of the Mobile Conference. About the year 1870 he removed to Newton county. There he united himself with the church at Centerville, where he lived in charity with the brethren until death removed him to the church triumphant.

He was married, by the writer, to Miss M. A. Finleyson, of Newton county, in September, 1870. Bro. Horten was a good and kind husband, a gentle and affectionate father, a dutiful and obedient son, and as a citizen he was highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was a Christian in the true sense of the term. He served the church as class-leader during the pastorate of Rev. John A. Vance, of the Centerville circuit, promising usefulness to the church; but the dark-winged angel of death hovered over him, cutting his work short. Bro. Horten felt that the end of his life was drawing near for twelve months previous to his death; but he still was calm and quiet when the subject was mentioned to him. Although he expressed a desire that he might live to train his two sweet little ones in the way they should go, yet he was resigned to the will of God, and met death with that calmness which characterizes the faithful, bold and trusting follower of Jesus.

Bro. Marion was brought up in the lap of Methodism and religion. He was schooled in the pure principles of the Methodist doctrines and of genuine piety. Yes, on his dying bed the remembrance of this influence was sweet to his soul. That the sacred fire had often burned around the family altar, and the earnest prayers offered, and the softening tears that had so often flowed from the sparkling eyes of happy parents, were unmistakable, we are living witnesses. We have mingled and shared with Marion, and his father and mother, in such feasts of joy. May Heaven's richest blessings come in showers upon the father's frosty head, that he may be richly rewarded in this life, and in the life to come, for such faithfulness to his family and the church, that, as he buries his children, he may again meet them in a better land than ours.

WILLIAM A. RAY.

MRS. TEMPERANCE SIMPSON (maiden name Kelly) was born June 22, 1789, and died May 18, 1874, aged eighty-four years, ten months and twenty-six days.

Sister Simpson was born in North Carolina. Her parents moved from there to Tennessee, where, in her twentieth year, she was married to Nathan Simpson. With her husband she then moved to Alabama, and from there to Mississippi, where she died. About the year 1832 she and her husband, who died in 1868, were converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at Skiffa, Simpson county, Mississippi, under the ministry of Rev. James Applewhite. Having turned her steps toward heaven, she never permitted her lamp to go out, but kept it trimmed and burning. She was truly an elect lady, and in her death the community in which she lived suffered an irreparable loss. Such was her piety and the consistency of her conduct, at home and abroad, that she was respected and loved by all who knew her. She adorned the doctrine of God her Savior in all things, and was always actively devoted to the interests of his kingdom. Her sympathies were readily enlisted in behalf of the suffering and needy, and by her benevolence and godly counsels many a heart has been made glad. To the wants of the preachers appointed to serve the church of which she was a member she ministered with an unsparing hand. She considered it a privilege, as well as a duty, to aid in any way in the promulgation of the gospel. She was given to hospitality, and many an itinerant has found here a Christian home, a pleasant retreat. As might be expected of such a Christian woman, especially when blessed with a like-minded husband, she was a model manager in all her domestic affairs. Neatness and order marked everything over which she had control. Her children were early trained, by precept and example, to serve the Lord. Five of them had died in the triumphs of faith, and the others are members of the militant church. As a token of the estimation in which she was held, the Quarterly Conference of the work on which she lived passed resolutions expressive of sorrow at her decease. She had long lived as a guide to the Savior, and, though for years she had been too feeble to go and worship with the public congregation, her loss was justly deemed a cause for lamentation. Having lived till life to her became a burden, she desired to depart and be with Christ. She said she wanted to go home, and just before her death she requested her son and two of her daughters, who were present, to sing one of the songs of Zion, which they did, and in ecstasies of joy her spirit took wings and flew away to the home of the Christian.

A BEGGAR posted himself at the door of an English chancery court, and kept saying: "A penny, please, sir! Only a penny, sir, before you go in!" "And for what, my man?" inquired an old country gentleman. "Because, sir, the chances are you will not have one when you come out!"

MY BIBLE TELLS ME SO.

When, faint and weary with the strife,
Temptations to o'ercome,
I long to leave this toilsome life,
And lay me down at home,
Then sweetly comes this thought to me:
Whate'er befide, I know
That as my day my strength shall be;
The Bible tells me so.

When sin brings clouds of doubts and fears
To spread before my eyes,
And faith grows weak, and scarce can pierce
Those clouds to reach the skies,
My heart cries out in trembling tones:
Oh! whither shall I go?
"Come unto me, ye weary ones!"
My Savior tells me so.

Yes, I will come; I'll trust thee, Lord,
The needed strength to give;
Oh! let me never doubt thy word;
I'd trust thee while I live,
And when I lay me down to die
I need not fear to go;
I have a home beyond the sky;
My Bible tells me so.

Spurgeon's Fortieth Year Sermon.

BY REV. JOHN LEYBURN, D. D.

On Saturday we reached London. On Sunday morning I set out for Spurgeon's Tabernacle, and through the kind offices of a friend, was accommodated with a seat in the first gallery, nearly on a level with the preacher, and very near him. Thirteen years ago I had heard him preach his first Sabbath sermon in that great house of God. But thirteen years, and the immense tax and strain of numerous and exciting duties, have told visibly on the renowned preacher. Not having observed his entrance, I could scarcely believe it was he, when I saw him with bowed head seated on the pulpit sofa. His appearance is much changed, partly because of his now wearing the entire beard, including mustache, instead of the clean-shaved face; but also because of ill health. His complexion is sallow, and he has a fagged look, as if the vital forces had been too heavily drawn upon. But the mighty congregation has not flagged, every part of the great structure, slow and aloft, being filled. Being near the preacher, I could not but wonder at the ease with which he made himself heard by all. The architect of this building, unlike most of his profession, made acoustics a main point, and not picturesque effect, as with us.

In the "invocation" we had a foretaste of good things, for I have seldom, if ever, heard a prayer more beautiful and devout. Old Testament imagery and New Testament gospel, and a believing, yearning soul combined. The first hymn was, "Blessed be the Father and his love," one of Watts', of which he read—as with the other hymns—only the first verse, and which he said would be sung to "Old Hundred," and he hoped they "would sing heartily to the praise of our God." And they did sing that sublime old song with a will and a warmth. Very few of the five thousand or more were dumb. Though on announcing the hymn only one verse was read, Spurgeon read each succeeding verse, as they proceeded, before it was sung, and so with the subsequent hymns. As everybody knows, they have no instrumental music—a precentor, who stands on the pulpit platform, leading.

The chapter read was the eighth of Deuteronomy—or, as he pronounced it, Deuteron*o*my, putting the accent on the penult. As usual with Spurgeon's Scripture readings, this was interesting, piquant and edifying; indeed I was more edified than with the sermon. In this, as in other parts of the service, there were traces of the school of affliction through which he has been passing. Speaking of the necessity for trials, in order to show us what is in us, he said: "A piece of wood may look well and seem fit to burn; but it is only when it is put on the fire that it begins to spit out the noxious juices, and show what was hidden in it. So with us when God puts us on the fire. We don't often discover, when put through such a process, that we are better than we thought we were; but usually that we are worse." Speaking of temptation, developing and bringing out of ruins true nature, he said: "The tame leopard may play like a cat about his master's house until he has got a taste of blood; but, once drinking that, he will no more rest until he roams the native wilds and gluts himself with gore." In the same vein he said: "A pond may seem very clear and pure, but draw it off and you will be astonished at the filth in the bottom." Speaking of thankfulness, he said: "We should be thankful for everything. We should never smell a rose without thanking our God for its delightful perfume. Some people give thanks for nothing—not even at the table for the food that keeps them alive, but rush on a meal like hogs on a trough." He spoke of England as "this heathen country, where they worship crucifixes, etc., and make dough and bake it, and call it the body of God," etc.; and then told his hearers to beware of the drift of the times.

After the "long prayer" came the singing of the twenty-third Psalm, which he asked might be sung "quickly and cheerfully." On reading the announcements before the sermon he said he expected to be absent the following Sunday, but that he hoped his regular congregation would all be in their places; otherwise it would be said that they came there to hear him, which he believed would be a slander.

The sermon was from Deuteronomy, chapter viii, verses 2–7: "And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness," etc. On the Friday of that week he would complete his fortieth year, and the sermon had reference to that. He said he would speak chiefly to those present who had completed forty years and more, and spoke: 1. Of things to be thankful for. 2. Things to regret. 3. Lessons to be learned. This is not his precise wording, but it gives the substance. He did not speak with the fervor or freedom which I have heard from him on several occasions in former years; but showed that the fires were burning low in the vital furnaces—giving another illustration, indeed, that nature's laws cannot be violated with impunity. Spurgeon has been attempting to do three or four men's work, and he is now in danger of finishing his time of labor at midday. When in London, in 1860, I was in company with him, and heard him say that he had then been preaching seven years, and that he had preached on an average two sermons a day, week-days and all, during the whole time! Is it any wonder that he begins to look worn, and suffers tortures of pain? In the course of the sermon he referred to his own causes for thankfulness, and intimated that God had blessed him by making him the instrument of bringing thousands of souls to Christ. Though not showing his usual power, there were occasional flashes. Speaking of the believer's struggles against sins, and how he fights and slays them, he said: "The way of the Israelites through the desert was marked by graves all through to the end. So the believer's journey heavenward must be marked by the graves of his sins. He must die daily." Comparing the believer's condition at the worst with the worldling's at the best, he said: "Better be God's dog than the devil's darling." Referring to the tendency of people as they prosper and get up in the world to seek after fashionable places of worship, he said: "They give up their father's religion and their noble heritage for the sake of being patted on the back by nobodys." Remonstrating against the way some professing Christians have of going as far as possible into worldly men's indulgencies, or at least showing that they would like to do so, he said: "Don't envy them; don't begrudge them the little joy they get. It is not much at best. They have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. Let them have it. Don't put your spoon into their dish."

During the sermon and since I have been asking myself: What can be the secret of Spurgeon's power? According to the popular American ideas as to oratory, he is not an orator. He does not rise to lofty flights; he does not deal in florid rhetoric; he is not poetic and pictorial; and his face lacks expression. What is he? He is full of sound doctrine and experimental piety; abounding in Scripture, especially Old Testament imagery; illustrating from current every-day affairs; ready in utterance; direct, familiar, earnest, sympathetic and remarkable for common sense. Dr. James W. Alexander used to say that he thought much of Spurgeon's power lay in his voice. But I scrutinized that point on this occasion. His voice is clear and strong, but not so rich, sonorous and powerful as some. I think it is rather the heart in the voice which gives Spurgeon much of his power. Every sentence he utters seems as if it had come direct from the sanctuary of a thoroughly sincere, sympathetic, honest, earnest heart. Even when he says things about himself they do not sound egotistical; and when occasionally he raises a smile it does not seem as if designed to make fun, as with some preachers we wot of, but because of the aptness or quaintness of his way of putting things.

A blessed work has Spurgeon done in this great world metropolis. Long may he live. I never leave his services but I feel that I have been edified. Would that all were such prophets, and that all could hear such preaching.—New York Observer.

LONDON, June 24, 1874.

Lost Atlantic Steamers.

It is a terrible fact, which may startle many of our readers, that in the space of thirty-three years since the unfortunate President left New York on the eleventh of March, 1841, never again to appear to mortal ken, leaving not a trace of her fate, nearly fifty fine steamers, including the West India mail boats, have, while on their passage across the Atlantic, been utterly destroyed. Of these, seven, after leaving port, mysteriously disappeared, and have never since been heard of; four were run down by or collided with other vessels; four were burned; one—the Canadian—ran on sunken ice in the Straits of Belle Isle on the fourth of June, 1861; one—the Helena Sloman—foundered in mid-ocean in November, 1850; and another—the Hibernia—met the same fate off the coast of Ireland in 1868.

The remainder of the melancholy list, amounting to nearly thirty vessels, were wrecked either on the Irish or British coasts, on those of America, or on islands or rocks off them. Fully eight of these ran in foggy weather on the shores of either Nova Scotia or Newfoundland on their westward voyages, a sufficient warning, it might be supposed, to captains to give the land a wide berth in those latitudes. One only—the Iowa—an American vessel, was wrecked on the French coast, near Cherbourg, in 1864. It is generally supposed that shipwrecks are caused by the rage of the elements, but of the thirty vessels which went on shore only three or four appear to have directly suffered in consequence of heavy weather. Miscalculations as to distances run and courses steered, clouded skies, dark nights, and, more generally than all, dense fogs were the primary causes of the destruction of all these vessels—if, as in too many instances, a reckless desire to make a quick run should not rather be set down to the account. Comparatively few of these shipwrecks occurred without serious loss of life, at least four thousand persons having perished among the passengers and crews who were on board. When the Atlantic was wrecked on Meagher's Head, off Nova Scotia, in 1873, no less than five hundred and sixty-two persons were drowned. With the City of Glasgow, in 1854, four hundred and eighty people disappeared. When the Austria was burned in mid-ocean, A. D. 1858, four hundred and seventy lives were lost; with the Arctic, three hundred; with the Anglo-Saxon, three hundred and seventy-two, and with the Ville du Havre, two hundred and twenty-six. The destruction of other vessels caused the loss of fewer lives than those named, as happily fewer passengers were on board; but with several on the list from one to two hundred human beings perished. On an average upward of three vessels have been lost every two years.

The most terrible beyond all description of those sad disasters was the loss of the Amazon, West India mail steamer, which left Southampton on the second of January, 1852. She was the largest steamship ever then launched from an English dockyard, and was built of oak, teak and Dantzic pine, the last being an exceedingly inflammable wood. Her officers and crew numbered one hundred and ten men, and she carried fifty passengers. From the first doubts were entertained about the engine, which worked badly, and heated the surrounding wood. She had not been thirty-six hours at sea when, as she was entering the Bay of Biscay against a strong headwind, flames suddenly burst forth from the engine-room, overcoming all efforts made to extinguish them. Her boats would have carried all on board, but the last fatal act of one of the engineers had been to turn on the pipe of the cistern which fed the boilers, so as to allow a continuous supply and prevent an explosion. Thus no power could stop the blazing ship, and the captain, not knowing what had occurred, in expectation that the boilers would exhaust themselves, waited till too late to lower the boats, several of which were on fire. The keels of others, to prevent them from swinging, were grasped in iron cradles, and when attempts were made to lower them, by those ignorant of the fact, capsized with all on board. Two lifeboats, the pinnace and dingy ultimately got off with fifty-eight persons, the only ones saved out of the one hundred and sixty-two who had left Southampton. Among those who perished was Eliot Warburton, author of "The Crescent and the Cross." The loss of the vessel was owing to her defective engines, and the unprotected condition of the surrounding woodwork. The destruction of life, however, was entirely in consequence of the engineer's error in judgment and the way in which the boats were secured. Had they been lowered in time, all in the after part of the ship might have been saved; but this would have been a most dangerous operation, from the speed at which the ship was tearing through the troubled waters.

The President heads the list of mysterious disappearances. With what awful anxiety tidings of her were waited for can be remembered by many. None ever came. The last account we have of her is that she left New York on the eleventh of March, 1841, having on board, among many passengers, a son of the Duke of Richmond, the Rev. B. Cookman, and poor Power, an author and the actor of Irish characters. Whether she caught fire, like the Amazon, or rushed headlong against an iceberg, or ran into or was run down by another vessel, like the Ville du Havre, will never be known. As icebergs are rarely met with in the course she would have taken, probably her fate was that of one or the other of those unhappy ships. More melancholy with regard to the number of lives sacrificed than even the loss of the President, was the destruction by fire of the Austria, in mid-ocean, on September 13, 1858, with four hundred and seventy of her passengers and crew. No sooner did the flames appear than all discipline was overthrown, and in the mad rush to the boats many perished who, had order been maintained, might have been saved. Two of the most serious losses are still fresh in our memories, as they occurred only last year. Of the Ville du Havre, run down by the Loch Earn, we have already spoken. One of the most frightful and sudden catastrophes in the annals of shipwreck was that of the Atlantic. She left Liverpool on the twentieth of March, 1873, bound for New York, with about one thousand persons on board, the greater number of whom were steerage passengers. Being short of coal she was steering for Halifax on a dark night, when the officers of the watch, under the belief that the ship was much farther off the land than was the case, mistook one light for another, and she was run stem on to a ledge of rocks off Meagher's Head, twenty miles from the port. A frantic attempt was made to lower the boats, when, after striking several times, the ship rolled over into deep water and sunk, engulfing nearly six hundred human beings, the remainder having in the meantime sprung on to the rocks or climbed into the rigging. Not a woman or child was saved, most of the hapless ones having been drowned in their berths below.—Leisure Hour.

Childhood in Japan.

When he is three years old the Japanese youth is invested with a sword belt, and four years later with two diminutive swords, if he belongs to the privileged class. The child's head is completely shaved until he is close upon four years old, and then three patches are grown, one at the back and one at each side. On this occasion the record of ceremonies ordains that "a large tray, on which are a comb, scissors, paper string, a piece of string for tying the hair in a knot, cotton wool, and the bit of dried fish or seaweed which accompanies presents, one of each, and seven rice straws—these seven articles must be prepared."

In another year's time the child is put into the loose trowsers peculiar to the privileged class, and he is then presented with "a dress of ceremony, on which are embroidered storks and tortoises (emblems of longevity; the stork is said to live one thousand years, the tortoise ten thousand,) fir-trees (which, being evergreen, and not changing their color, are emblematic of an unchangingly virtuous heart,) and bamboos (emblematic of an upright and straight mind.")

Soon after the child has reached his fifteenth year, a fortunate day is chosen, on which the forelock is cut off, and at this period, being considered a man, he is intrusted with swords of ordinary size; and on this occasion, in particular, great family festivities and rejoicings take place in honor of the auspicious event. The lad then comes of age, and, casting away childish things, adopts the dress of a grown-up man in every particular. Japanese youths are said to be quite equal to the occasion, and, even at this early age, to adapt themselves most readily to the habits of manhood.

At the stages in his life which we have alluded to, the child has a sponsor, and certain wine-drinking customs and prescribed festivities have to be carefully attended to.

Some Japanese must have a string of names awful to contemplate, if strict custom be always adhered to; for, besides the name which he receives shortly after his birth, Humbert tells us that "he will take a second on attaining his majority, a third at his marriage, a fourth when he shall be appointed to any public function, a fifth when he shall ascend in rank or in dignity, and so on until the last, the name which shall be given him after his death, and inscribed upon his tomb—that by which his memory shall be held sacred from generation to generation."—All the Year Round.

Livingstone on Missions.

Livingstone, says the Friend of India, remained the missionary to the end. One of his last letters concluded with an appeal of combined earnestness and irony, when he thus alluded to the conduct of the Ritualist party in Madagascar and elsewhere: "If you got into other men's labors you need not tell at home who reared the converts you have secured, but you will feel awfully uncomfortable, even in heaven, till you have made abject apologies to your brethren, who, like yourselves, are heaven-ward bound." He thus addresses those who hold back: "Come on brethren; you have no idea how brave you are till you try. The real heathen who are waiting for you have many faults; but also much that you can esteem and love." He thus exposes the selfish argument, which was such a favorite with Dickens and other novelists: Why go to the heathen abroad, so long as we have so very many heathen at home? "It is only the large-hearted that go to either, and the class distinguished by large-heartedness unquestionably do much for our home population, and is the very class that do the most for the heathen abroad." The question supposed to be put tacitly assumes that the heathen at home are neglected, and this is a manifestly false assumption. I can look upon the labors of all sorts of Christians for the benefit of our own people with the eye of a stranger, and the sight of the various agencies, appliances and contrivances in constant operation for Christianizing the masses, I cannot call by any less expressive epithet than marvelous. * * * We are learning the unwisdom of sending raw recruits, under twenty years of age, to India. Would it not be well to give missionary recruits a few years of home labor to break them into their life's work abroad? From the general tenor of these remarks it will be seen that I feel obstinately inclined to 'stand by the down man,' be his name or color what it may."

HOW SHOT IS MADE.—A reporter of the Baltimore American thus describes one of the many processes of making shot in one of the shot-towers of that city: "One of the 'secrets' of the manufacture is the mixing of the lead with a certain proportion of a combination of mineral substances called 'temper.' The temper is fused with the lead, and gives the molten metal that consistency which makes it drop, and without which the lead would be molded by the sieve, and would form little pencils, instead of round shot. When 'BB' shot, for instance, are to be made, the lead is poured into a pan perforated with holes corresponding to that size. The little pellets come pouring down in a continuous shower, and fall into a tank filled with water on the ground floor. In their descent of two hundred feet they become perfect spheres, firm and dense, and they are tolerably cool when they strike the water, although the swift concussions make the tank foam and bubble as if the water was boiling furiously. The shot must fall in the water, for if they would strike any firm substance they would be flattened and knocked out of shape. To get the little pellets perfectly dry after they have been in the 'well' is the most difficult and troublesome process of the whole manufacture. An elevator with small buckets (very much like those used in flour mills) carries the shot up as fast as they reach the bottom of the well, and deposits them in a box sixty feet above the first floor. The water drips from the buckets as they go up, and not much is poured into the receiver above, although it is intended to be a sort of dripping machine. From this receiver the shot runs down a spout into a drying pan, which greatly resembles a gigantic shoe made of sheet-iron. The pan rests at an angle which permits the wet shot to roll slowly down to the chamber below, and the pellets become perfectly dry as they pass over the warm sheet-iron."

IN SUM, the grace of God hath abundantly sufficient for all. We are by it that we are, and at the length by it we shall be that we would. What we have and what we shall have is the fruit of his goodness, and not a thing which we can claim by right or title of our own worth. All that we can do to him cometh far behind the sum of that we owe; all we have from him is more bounty. And seeing all that we of ourselves can do is not only nothing but naught, let him alone have the glory by whose only grace we have our whole ability and power of well-doing.

DR. ARMITAGE ASKS: "Why is it that infidelity has no hymns?" Think of that a minute. It is good to sing of heaven, but to sing of non-existence, the pleasures of nowhere—well, it is not singable, that is very true.

Religious Intelligence.

ROMAN CATHOLICS in Wisconsin are leaving the Granges, the Bishop of Milwaukee having issued a pastoral against them.

ACCORDING to the American Mail, of Rio de Janeiro, the first Presbyterian Church in Brazil was dedicated in that city on the twenty-ninth of March.

AT THE recent anniversary of the American Congregational Union, England, it was estimated that the church property throughout the country on which the Union has legal claims is worth about £650,000.

THE Protestant Episcopal Convention of Maryland has taken a stand against Ritualism in refusing, by a vote of 119 to 52, to permit the organization of the Church of the Holy Communion, composed of ritualistic members.

THE Roman Catholic Society for the Propagation of the Faith has the largest income of any of the missionary societies. Last year it amounted to $1,101,838, which was $15,000 less than in 1872, when special efforts were made in view of the fiftieth anniversary of the society.

A FOREIGN exchange says the Established Church of Scotland (Presbyterian) still opens its General Assembly with what the London Freeman describes as "the ridiculous royal procession," headed by his grace the lord high commissioner and six city policemen, and closing with a small detachment of dragoons.

BISHOP CUMMINS DEPOSED.—Although Dr. Cummins has not been publicly deposed as assistant Bishop of Kentucky, his deposition, according to a statement of the Bishop of central New York, was decided by the Bishops May 20. The Kentucky Diocesan Convention voted to pay his salary up to the time of his withdrawal.

THE English Primitive Methodist Conference, at its session in June, was able to report an increase of 4,002 members, 15 traveling and 87 local preachers, 29 connectional chapels, 80 schools, 914 teachers and 9,821 scholars for the year—a state of things which fills our brethren with devout gratitude, and with joyous trust for the future.

UP TO THE time of the meeting of the late Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church the whole of the expenses in sustaining the organization have been met by voluntary contributions. For the coming year $20,000 will be needed, of which $10,000 have been provided, and $4,600 of the residue was subscribed during the session of the council.

THE Old Catholic Synod at Bonn has adopted a resolution which abolishes obligatory confession, but allows and advises that "if any man cannot quiet his own conscience" by self-examination, he may open his grief to his priest. Confession is carefully left to each man's inclination and sense of personal duty, and is minutely hedged about by restrictions.

IT IS proposed to hold the next session of the Evangelical Alliance in the city of Rome. Some of the managers of the Alliance are in favor of going to Jerusalem, and it is suggested as a compromise that the meeting shall begin at Rome and adjourn to Jerusalem with as many members as may be able to take the journey thither. So says the Evening Post.

A SECRETARY of the Board of American Missions says that the financial condition of the board is more serious than for twelve years, perhaps since 1837. The debt, June 1, was $82,753. When the Presbyterians left the board they took more income than expenditure. The fires in Chicago and Boston, and the financial revolutions would explain the rest.

FATHER GRASSI, who turned Protestant last year, has taken another step in apostasy by leading a bride to the altar. The wedding was attended by Father Gavazzi and six or seven other ex-priests. The Abbe Chevard has also married, his bride being a young French lady of Marseilles. Pere Hyacinthe officiated at the wedding, and delivered an eloquent discourse on the occasion.

THE American Missionary Association among the Chinese in California has nine schools and eleven teachers under its charge. Three of these have both day and evening sessions; the rest are held in the evening. No less than 763 names have been enrolled in connection with these schools since October 1. There were added during the month of March 118, and 220 remained on the first of this month.

THE Lucknow (India) Witness of April 24 says: "Rev. William Taylor has organized a Methodist Episcopal church in Madras. The membership amounts to about one hundred and seventy-five, nearly all of whom have been converted under his ministry. Mr. Taylor is still working in Madras, preaching six times each week, meeting nine 'fellowship bands,' and spending five days in visiting. The good work goes steadily forward."

THE Evangelical Alliance of the Dominion of Canada propose holding their first General Conference in the city of Montreal, in October next. Desirous of promoting the growth in Canada of the principles, the spirit and the aims of the Evangelical Alliance, and of strengthening the interests of our common Christianity, they have resolved to solicit the presence and aid of eminent Christian brethren not only from the provinces of the Dominion, but also from Great Britain, the United States and elsewhere.

BISHOP ALFORD, late Bishop of Victoria, in China, has written to the Archbishop of Canterbury that if certain forms of posture be admitted as part of the administration of the holy communion, it will be a grave question with him whether he can longer be a member of the Church of England! Dr. Pusey, the originator of the Ritualistic movement in the Church of England, although he has no sympathy with its most advanced developments, has just issued a pamphlet, and in a preface gives his views on the latest aspects of the question at issue between the Ritualists and the bishops. He believes that the present excitement will subside, and that the Ritualists will be satisfied when so much of ritual shall be conceded as shall mark out the holy eucharist to be the "center of Christian worship and closest union with God and our redeeming Lord." "When the bishops," says Dr. Pusey, "shall be freed from the incubus of the Purchas judgment, I doubt not that if they act in the fatherly and loving way suggested by the Bishop of Lincoln, the High Church clergy will, as a body, listen to their suggestions; individual excesses will drop off, and congregations of English Churchmen will easily be reassured, if any have indeed been disturbed. Dissenters must be won to the church by learning that the church possesses gifts which they have not; not (as in Ireland) by her effacing her own doctrines, so that one wonders she does not unite with some Presbyterian body, and abolish the episcopate, the import of whose office the Irish are fast abolishing."

PREACHING ON A VELOCIPEDE.—The Church Missionary Gleaner has a letter from a missionary at Agurpa, in Bengal, in which he gives the following account of the evangelistic labors of a native convert: "Baboo Guruchum Hose, who has been with me since his conversion in 1842, as head master of the English school, and has always assisted me in preaching the gospel to the heathen, is now, notwithstanding his laborious duties in the school, out every morning and evening, combining exercise with preaching. He starts on his velocipede about four or five o'clock in the morning, and goes a great distance toward either end of the Harnackpore road. On his way he invariably finds groups of men and women, either as travelers from great distances or as vendors of vegetables going to the different markets. When they are proceeding in the same direction with him, he joins them and enters into religious conversations, and points out to them Jesus Christ as the only Savior of sinners. Should he meet such groups going in the opposite direction, he turns and accompanies them, speaking all the while about the salvation of their souls. Very frequently the traveling groups rest themselves for awhile on the roadside. He also stops and preaches. Presently other groups come up, one after another, and form a large body of hearers of the gospel. The distant people from cities and villages hear of Christ and his salvation."

MR. SPURGEON has spoken out in his own paper, the Sword and Trowel, in reply to those American Baptists who keep saying that "if Spurgeon were in America he would be a close communionist." His article is in reply to a writer in the Examiner and Chronicle, and the following passage is one which we may be very sure the readers of that journal will never see in its columns: "We cannot judge the hearts of members of churches, whether baptized or unbaptized; we are in communion with the whole visible church of our Lord Jesus Christ as such, and, if any have entered that church who are not regenerated persons, we are not able to cease from fellowship with the wheat because the tares have sprung up therewith. We will ask our opponent one question: 'If, among the living members of the body of Christ, there be an unimmersed believer, how can he cease to have fellowship with that one, seeing that all the members of one body must of necessity have fellowship with each other?' Will he deny the existence of such members? Or will he say that he gives them the substance of such fellowship, but dares not give them the sign? We would not have said even this much, but it is asked for by our pugilistic brethren, and we hope it will please them now that they have got it. We love them too well to be further provoked by them. We only want them to believe that our silence does not arise from our having nothing to say. It would answer no good end to open a controversy about communion, and therefore we do not intend to do it; but if we ever should show fight it will be no fault of ours, but the responsibility must lie with these zealots across the water who are forever shaking their fists in our face."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Congregationalist furnishes the following description of an Old Catholic service at Bonn: "On coming here to reside, we sought in the English and in the German Evangelical Church a regular place of worship, but in both were lonely and unsatisfied. The spirit of Jesus did not seem to fill the hearts of either preachers or hearers. At last we went to the Old Catholic service, and listened to Prof. Knoodt. I cannot describe the delight that thrilled us as we heard his glowing words of love. We felt again happy and at home, because of the presence of Jesus; and so Sabbath after Sabbath has found us among the worshipers in the lofty old chapel of the University. But one service is held, and that at the early hour, of nine. The house is filled, and every one appears earnest and devout. Even the children listen with reverent interest. The service is very simple, retaining but little of the ritual of the Romish Church. Indeed I have seen in the 'High' churches of England a much closer approach to Rome than is witnessed here. All join in the singing, and so full of melody is the place that the frescoed angels on the ceiling sometimes seem but shadows of the true, who are in our midst, helping us to sound our praises to the Lord. The service is conducted by Profs. Knoodt, Langen and Reusch, of the University, who preach in regular succession. The sermons have hardly a trace of controversy. Those of Prof. Knoodt are especially noteworthy. His intimate acquaintance with the Bible and deep insight into its truths, his spirit of love and tenderness, and his intense earnestness give him extraordinary power. He seems to come from communion with his Savior, and his face glows as he seeks to lead his hearers into the same blessed fellowship. Rarely have I heard such appeals as come from his lips."

The Shadow of a Rock.

In the arid desert a vast rock, mountain-like in its proportions, rises to view. In the treeless waste, with burning sands beneath the feet and a scorching sun overhead, such an object is hailed by the traveler with delight. It is in a land of drouth and barrenness that the grateful refuge invites to safety and repose. In the clefts are stores of water, and beneath its overhanging and beetling brows there is the densest shade. Here the caravan may halt in its tired journey, and man and beast find the coveted refreshment. The fatigue and suffering of the march already accomplished are forgotten, and now strength and spirit are gathered for the way which remains to be passed. During these melting days we can better appreciate the imagery of the prophet, as, looking down the ages, he catches a glimpse of the divine King, the promised Savior, and that Messiah, Christ, is "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

Other shadows are comparatively changeful. The shadow of a cloud, unless miraculous, like that which led the Israelites through the wilderness, is a type of all that is fleeting and uncertain. How soon is the face of the heavens changed! A thousand transformations in a day, shifting scenes of inimitable beauty and wondrous variety, and all the inexhaustible wealth of nature's coloring, endless and rapid exhibitions of the sublime, grotesque and beautiful in form, combined with the mixing of those tints and dyes which no painter's skill has ever put upon the canvas, are the creations of an hour. And in an equally brief space the face of the sky is swept clear, and not a fleck is left to tell of the vaporous masses which hung so densely over our heads.

The tree is a boon to man, and to beasts and birds as well, for the shade it gives. In the sultry heats, and especially in the dusty and care-breeding city, we feel that nothing less than "some vast wilderness," "a boundless contiguity of shade," will afford the relief for which we sigh. If we cannot have a Banyan, with its ever-multiplying trunks, or a cedar of Lebanon, let us abide under a live oak of such spreading proportions as we see them here. A real broad-limbed live-oak, close down by the sea, where the tide ripples about its roots, and the land and sea breezes by turns play among its boughs, is certainly good for something besides the building of ships. It stands for generations, and possibly for centuries, and passively meets the shock of the storms; but it yields at last, a victim to the same scythe that cuts down grass and flowers and men. Considering the ordinary brevity of human life, it is a remarkable promise, to be fulfilled in the times of the latter-day glory, that "as the days of a tree are the days of my people." But of whatever sort they are, and wherever they grow—the giant redwood of California, the evergreen monarchs enthroned on Lebanon, the oaks of Louisiana—all yield to decay and death.

But the rock is a symbol of the immutable, a type of the immortal. It stands where trees cannot grow, and lifts its head amidst trackless wastes, defying the centuries. The seasons revolve, the nations rise and fall, life and death, storm and sunshine, seed-time and harvest work their ceaseless round of change, but the rock is untouched. It reared its rugged form above the plain long before man came upon the earth; there it stood before the pen of history began to write; races and nations have flourished and perished around it, and it will stand unaltered and unscathed until the end of time.

The Messiah of prophecy is to us a realized salvation. To the trustful and believing he is even thus—"the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." God prepared a gourd for Jonah, and also a worm to smite the gourd. Like all earthly things that give us temporary shelter and gladness, it was to teach a lesson greater than the momentary joy it inspired. That which came up in a night and perished in a night is all unlike the overshadowing rock; but it is a type of those passing and ephemeral pleasures and of all worldly objects in which men seek for comfort and happiness. Our best earthly shelters are as fragile shrubs, worm-eaten and withering, in comparison with the great Rock of our salvation. A weary world full of foot-sore pilgrims, languid and faint, and almost ready to die, is this world of ours. A weary land, strewed with the wreck of hosts that have been swallowed up, and covered with the bleaching bones of those who failed to reach a place of repose. There are men weary with the work of life, men weary with the pursuit of exciting pleasures, and multitudes weary under the burden of pain and affliction; and there are some who are weary with their sins—those that labor and are heavy laden under a weight of guilt and wretchedness worse than all other sufferings.

A weary land, and this great Rock rises amidst the dreary plain of sin and misery. Its lofty head can be seen from afar, and its ample shade invites the whole tired and troubled race to come and be at rest. Coming down to gospel times, and emerging from the types and twilight of prophecy, the rock which Isaiah saw is a divine man, and his lips are clothed with persuasive grace and consoling promise. How like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land is he who ransoms us from sin and death, and who throws out to the weary world the challenge of his love: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Heart-Searchings.

The religion of Jesus Christ is a religion purely of the heart. "The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart."—First Samuel xvi, 7. "My son, give me thine heart."—Proverbs xiii, 26. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness."—Romans x, 10. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."—Matthew v, 8. These are only a few of the numerous passages of Scripture which teach the important truth above expressed. How essential, then, that those who profess the religion of Christ should fully understand the condition of their own hearts.

Here we will quote a declaration of God's word, which, if we had the power, we would write as with a pen of iron upon the mind and conscience of every son and daughter of Adam under the wide canopy of heaven. It is this: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Who can know it?"—Jeremiah xvii, 9. Oh, how often are we made sensible, in our experience, of the truth of this declaration! Our own hearts deceive us; and many who pride themselves upon their sincerity, many who would abhor the idea of going deliberately to work to deceive or to act the hypocrite, do, nevertheless, fearfully deceive themselves and play the hypocrite in the sight of God. Many do this who pray and read the Bible daily. Nay, more, many do this who pray sincerely. While believing themselves to be the servants of Christ, they are influenced often by the spirit of the devil. This may seem a startling statement, but it is nevertheless true; and under this delusion consequences may ensue which will sadden the life of many a professed follower of Christ until the good Lord shall call him away from the sorrowing scenes of earth.

Why is this so? Simply because we do not frequently search our hearts by the light of God's word, for that is the standard by which we are to be judged, and by which we are to judge ourselves. It is by a conformity to that word that we are to attain to perfection in Christian life. The Savior, in his prayer for his disciples, says: "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

In reading the proceedings of our late General Conference, when we came to the report of the committee requesting the Bishops to urge upon our people, in their pastoral address, certain important duties, we could not help wishing we had been there to offer an amendment to that report; for we think the most important duty of all was omitted, viz.: frequent self-examination or daily heart-searching. Without this the others will amount to little. When we say search we do not mean a superficial examination, but a probing of the heart to its very depths. We mean a daily examination of not only our conduct, but our affections, our feelings, our thoughts. We go further still—we should analyze our thoughts, and discover the real motives which prompt them. Analyze them rigidly and fearlessly. It may cause pain more agonizing than the probing of the tenderest fleshly wound. If so, so much the greater need for the examination. The actual condition of the heart and the motives prompting it having been discovered, then hold it up to the light of God's word and compare it with that. Do not falter, do not flinch, but hold it there faithfully and steadily. Is there anything there not in consonance with the requirements of that word? "Cut it off and cast it from thee," no matter how painful it may be. Do not hesitate. Our blessed Savior absolutely requires it.

We are willing enough to judge others and to impugn their motives, but how reluctant to sit in judgment upon ourselves! The oftener we judge ourselves the more we search our own hearts by the light of divine truth, the more thoroughly we become imbued with a sense of our own unworthiness, and of that love for others which the great apostle to the Gentiles pronounces the crowning Christian virtue, and without which we are as nothing in the sight of God.

It is declared (First Corinthians xi, 31:) "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged;" the evident meaning of which is that "we must judge ourselves to prevent our being judged and condemned by God." We are poor, frail mortals, always inclined to evil, and the great adversary of souls is ever vigilant, and has his emissaries continually about us, holding out inducements to sin. He is always ready to take advantage of our weakness, and we are but too prone to yield. Then, when we find that we have become lukewarm and negligent, that we are indulging in sinful thoughts and sinful desires, we naturally feel disinclined to search our hearts and to apply to them the teachings of the sacred word. We shrink from it. We too often content ourselves with prayer and reading of the Scriptures—sometimes neglecting even that, or performing it in a perfunctory manner—and fail to examine our hearts, to see whether or not our inclinations, our purposes and all our thoughts are in conformity to the teachings of divine truth.

We would not limit the mercy of God. His word abounds in expressions of his infinite love and compassion, and far be it from me to say that he does not save some, and perhaps many, who repent even in the hour of death; but no matter how many prayers may be offered, or how often the Bible may be read, there can be no substantial growth in grace, no high standard of Christian excellence, nor can we refrain from actual sin without a faithful, fearless and frequent examination of our hearts; aye, if we may be allowed the expression, a turning them inside out, and a thorough eradication of every affection, every feeling, every thought, every motive opposed to the requirements of God's word. Let us be honest with God. Let us be honest with ourselves. Are we "pure in heart?" If not, are we striving daily for purity of heart? St. John says: "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." This evidently means that every man who has faith in Christ and a hope of eternal life repeatedly examines his own heart by the light of God's word, and, resolutely purging it from everything impure, endeavors to conform himself to the image of Christ—to be Christ-like—so that all his affections and inclinations may be such as the Master shall fully approve. We cannot be as pure as Christ, but we may be like him. By an honest and rigid examination of our hearts, resolutely endeavoring to cast out every thought opposed to the teachings of Christ, and a diligent study of his word looking to this end, relying upon our infinite Father through faith in his dear Son, we may become like unto our glorious Lord and Master, "and changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." Without this self-examination we are "become as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal."

Oh, may we all be enabled, each day, in sincerity to exclaim with the psalmist: "Search me, oh, God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting!"

MR. EDITOR: The commencement of Corvallis College is just past. It was a time of interest, and compares favorably with like occasions on the other side of the continent. Four young men and one young lady bore away degrees from the college. I know they are good scholars, or they would not have passed the test imposed. The co-education of the sexes, under vigilant government, does well. There is a grand destiny before Corvallis College, with its ninety thousand acres of endowment and $5,000 a year subsidy from the State for the support of the agricultural department.

A railroad extending from Corvallis to Aquina bay, on the Pacific, is about to be a reality, as preliminary steps have been taken to open books to-morrow for subscriptions of stock. This is a desirable and very important enterprise. Aquina is about fifty miles from Corvallis. The harbor and anchorage are good. The entrance can, with blasting, be made sufficient for the largest steamers. It will bring the heart of this great valley about five hundred miles nearer San Francisco, and lessen our freights and passage perhaps one-half; and, instead of requiring four or five days' favorable weather to get to San Francisco, two or three will suffice to go to our great commercial center. This will do much to develop this wonderful land of Goshen. Lands and houses are on the rise. Emigrants, from the Western States mostly, are coming on every steamer that arrives at our port—Portland.

"Westward the star of empire makes its way." This is the limit of westward emigration. The wave of emigration here meets the billows of the great Pacific, and bound back at the voice: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

This is the land of sunset, reminding one of life's close. By the way, we have rich and gorgeous sunsets here. The aurora of morn breaks above the Cascade mountains as early as three o'clock, and evening twilight radiates till about ten o'clock, making daylight nineteen hours. The evening twilight I can testify to; the morning aurora I am not an eye-witness of. This is a wonderful country for sleeping—good, wholesome, solid sleep, without dreaming. We say:

"Blessed is the man that invented sleep"—
"Calm nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

Crops look well and promise ample remuneration to the sons of the soil. Wheat, oats, barley, flax, etc., are luxuriant and present a beautiful aspect. The "waving grain" is more fact than fancy. Small fruits and berries are abundant. Cherries, strawberries, raspberries, currants, gooseberries, etc., are now being preserved and made into jelly. A certain housewife states that jelly made of currants is beautiful and most delicately flavored. These berries are both white and red. Milk, butter and cheese, of the very best quality, are abundant. Grass is nutritious and fine.

So far this proves to be a healthy country. Measles have been prevalent among old and young. Consumption prevails to some extent, yet I do not find it as common as I expected. Pneumonia or lung fever had its victims last winter. I hear of very little sickness as I pass through the country. We have excellent water—mostly wells; beautiful, swift-running streams here and there as you pass through the country.

I can, I think, with truth reiterate substantially what I have stated in regard to this country in previous letters in the ADVOCATE. I see no cause to change materially my views as then expressed.

Those pictures—well, they created quite a stir in our house. They shall be placed in our private picture gallery, whither we shall oft repair to muse on days of yore.

Course of Study for Sunday Schools.

It is a source of great pleasure to every lover of the church to witness the growing interest manifested by all the religious denominations of our country in giving more and more importance to the organization of Sabbath schools, and furnishing them with every facility for imparting instruction to the children and youth of our country.

The Sabbath school organizations of the various churches, with their numerous officers and teachers, have grown up to be a great power in the land for good, and one that is destined still to progress and perfect itself as an indispensable part of our church economy. With every reflecting mind the questions will arise as to whether we have yet reached the best methods of imparting instruction, and so systematized our course of study as to accomplish all that is desirable by this very efficient agency of the church.

These questions have time and again been brought before our Sunday school conventions, and Annual and General Conferences, and been elaborately discussed; but what has been the result? Very few changes have been made. The introduction of the Uniform Lessons is all that has been attempted for many years. Is this sufficient? This has accomplished much good, no doubt; for a Sunday school is bound to do good any way. The Uniform Lessons do not pretend to systematize and present the great doctrines and teachings of the Bible as a system; but selections are made of such parts as may suit the fancy of the one who prepares them; and all the advantage seems to be that all our schools, by this plan, have the same lessons on each succeeding Sunday. Is there any great advantage in that?

I think it time for Sunday school workers to pause and ask themselves: What are we trying to do? Is it not to teach the children of the church to read and understand the Bible—the whole of it? Can anything else be substituted for the word of God? Is it not the object of a Sunday school to give our youth a religious education? Can this be done by pursuing a miscellaneous course? Does any other school pursue such a course? If it is our object to train up the rising generation to a thorough knowledge of our sublime system of theology, can we do it without a system—a course of study? Is not such a course prescribed to all others who seek to study the Bible systematically? Is there a school of any kind in the whole country which does not lay down a regular curriculum for the control of every student, by which all his studies are regulated and his progress measured? If this is so, what is there in a well-regulated Sabbath school that should make it to differ from all others?

Nothing great can be accomplished by any one, in any pursuit, without a well-regulated system. But, strange to say, there is no course of study, no definite system of instruction, to be found in any Sabbath school of our church, or of any other in the United States. This declaration is made after fifteen years of investigation, and an extensive correspondence with leading Sunday school men of all the principal denominations. In this investigation and correspondence I have not yet found an intelligent Sunday school man that did not agree with me that such a regulated system was indispensable to perfect success in our church schools.

If the position I have taken is correct, then there are two or three other inquiries that must be noticed. 1. Have we such a course of study as is demanded by the wants and interests of our church schools? 2. Have we a system of books suited to such a course of study, if it was adopted by the church? 3. Is the subject of sufficient importance to justify the change, and to go to the expense of preparing and publishing the necessary books?

To these questions we briefly reply: 1. That we have no system drawn out in detail; nor is that necessary until we agree upon its expediency. When that is settled, we propose to ask the Bishops or the General Conference to select a man, or a select number of our able and learned men, to prescribe the course of study, as they do for our young preachers—one that shall require five, six or more years' study; and after each student has completed the full course, and borne a good examination, let him receive a diploma, or certificate corresponding to their merits. 2. It may require four or five years to prepare all the books, and have them on sale at our Publishing House; but time and money could not be better spent, and the Publishing House could bring out no books that would meet with a more extensive and ready sale. 3. Is it of sufficient importance, etc.? Who can estimate the importance of converting our Sunday schools into theological nurseries? They are so regarded now by some; but surely there are none who would for a moment contend that we now occupy the high ground we should; and certainly the elevated position contended for will cost no more time and labor to carry it out, when once established, than our present "point-no-point" system.

The good time coming, when all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest—when knowledge shall cover the earth as the waters the great sea—seems to contemplate such a school of the church to bring it about. Very truly,

B. T. KAVANAUGH.

The Proposed Liquor Law.

This law forbids "making, buying, selling or using, as a beverage, intoxicating liquors." The phraseology provides for the making, buying, selling or using intoxicating liquors ad infinitum, and forbids only that they should be made, bought, sold or used as a beverage. But the intention of many voting for this law was to make the church a total abstinence society. The law being taken from the "Constitution and By-Laws of the Division of the Sons of Temperance," it is presumable that it was in view to have it construed according to the rulings in said order, and require a physician's prescription before using any of said liquors. But, whether to be construed by some worthy patriarch or by the constituted church authorities, we object to this total abstinence law as a law of the church.

Our objection is that the church has no authority to make a moral law. The church may set forth in any form moral laws already made, but it has no right to make a new moral law. Moral laws are made by the Lord, not by men. No Methodist will claim for himself or for his church conferences this right. To usurp it is to act immorally. The advocates of the proposed law acknowledge this principle, and hence appeal to the Scriptures.

This total abstinence law is not in the Scriptures, neither directly set forth nor deducible from any law found therein. Let us notice some scriptures quoted to prove a Scripture total abstinence law. Here is one: "Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine." This looks like total prohibition, but when you turn to Joel i, 5 you find the whole verse to read: "Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine, because of the new wine, for it is cut off from your mouth." In this connection we read: "Be ye ashamed, O ye husbandmen; howl, O ye vinedressers, for the wheat and for the barley; because the harvest of the field is perished." Instead of being a denunciation of wine-drinking, the book of Joel is a description of the devastation of Judah because of the sins of the people in which the vineyards and fields and flocks should be cut off, and even the meat offering and drink offering from the house of the Lord. Instead of being a denunciation against wine-drinking, the Lord promised that upon the thorough repentance of the people he would send them "corn and wine and oil," and that they should "be satisfied therewith;" he promised that the floors should "be full of wheat and the fats should overflow with wine;" that the "mountains should drop down new wine, and the hills flow with milk and all the rivers with water." Another scripture quoted to prove the law of total abstinence is: "He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink." That looks like total abstinence by command. But turn to Numbers vi and you will learn who "he" is, and what is required of him. "He" is a Nazarite, who had taken upon himself the vow of a Nazarite. The Nazarites are here commanded to refrain from wine, from the vinegar of wine, from grapes, from cutting their hair, from touching any dead body. The vow of a Nazarite was voluntary, and for a time or life, as a man might choose. After the time of the vow the Nazarite cut his hair, and was allowed to drink wine, as before his vow. But few of the people ever took the vow of a Nazarite, and most of these only for a time. It is possible that John the Baptist was a Nazarite; Christ was not.

Another scripture quoted is: "Put away thy wine from thee." That has the total abstinence look. But turn to First Samuel i, 14, where Hannah, in her deep distress, anxiously prayed to God. Eli "thought she had been drunken, and said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? Put away thy wine from thee." Because Eli thought Hannah drunk, and commanded her to cease her drunkenness, therefore—what? Why all men, everywhere, on this false supposition of Eli and his rough speech to Hannah, are forbidden to touch wine. Another scripture quoted is: "Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions," etc.? "They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright." Does this refer to mixed wine, or is the drunken state of the man here set forth in the wine? There is no total abstinence exhortation in this scripture.

Besides these scriptures, the enforcers of a total abstinence law quote freely about "drunkards" and "drunkenness." But why talk about drunkards and drunkenness when these are not involved in the question?

There is no law in the Scriptures enjoining total abstinence; there is no scripture from which such law can be drawn by deduction or implication. Such deduction might be made but that the allowed practice throughout the history of the church forbids it. There being no law in Scripture, it is not allowed to us to make one. To do so would be immoral. It is, however, proposed to make a law, and to make one which would exclude the Savior himself from the communion of the church. John the Baptist was a Nazarite; Christ was not. The Jews were pleased with neither. Christ said to them: "John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine, and ye say he hath a devil. The Son of Man is come eating and drinking, and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber." Now it is proposed not only to censure the Savior as the Jews did, but to turn him out by human legislation. Will we not feel rather lost when we sever the connection? But is it judged that a new moral law is demanded by the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors? There were drunkards and drunkenness in former times, yet this did not, in the counsel of the All-Wise, call for a total abstinence law. God is the wisdom and lawgiver of his own church. It is not for man to declare his laws defective, or to add thereto his human enactments. Yet there are many in these latter times who think the church in great need of many auxiliary associations, and that the laws promulgated from on high need the additional touches of human wisdom. Whether this argues a true faith in God and his plans, or is the result of want of confidence, can be easily decided.

This is written not in advocacy of moderate drinking, but simply against the enactment of a law which is unscriptural and on no ground justifiable.

The Whirlwind of Elijah.

BY PROF. J. A. PAINE.

A genuine whirlwind is unknown in our native land. Occasionally we have tornadoes which carry everything before them, either by a direct gale or more rarely by rotary gusts of wind; but these are of too violent and tempestuous a character to be included under the term. A whirlwind proper has no connection with a storm. The nearest approaches we have at home to the whirlwinds of the Bible are those little gyrations of the air which take rise at the street-corners or around buildings exposed to the wind, raising dust, sand, leaves, straw, etc., to the height of thirty to fifty feet, that spin along a few rods and then are all over.

A real whirlwind is a peculiar institution of Palestine, and in Palestine it is not often met with till one passes the high mountain range of the western portion. In the valley of the Jordan whirlwinds are often found; and then, when one climbs, on the other side, the steep ascents to the uplands of Moab, Ammon, Gilead, Gaulanitis, over toward the east, they are met with still oftener, the more numerous the further one goes toward the great desert of the interior.

Two conditions are required for the whirlwind—a rugged border and a depression beyond. As the wind comes steadily along, sweeping over the uneven crest, it is thrown into eddies by a return impulse to fill the space behind sheltered from its force, and so, from the continuance of the air movement and the permanence of the obstruction, the eddy grows strong and great, till, taking up something to make the convolution visible, we cry: A whirlwind! Now, if the surface of a range or of the earth falls away and offers no obstacle, this rotatory motion will be kept up for an indefinite length of time. An unusual amount of circular force, accumulated at such points, departs from its place of origin and is borne on by the general drift of the air. As it departs it distributes itself along its axis of motion into a column. It does not stop revolving simply because there is nothing to stop it, and it ceases only when diffused into the air around it is generalized away, after a half an hour, it may be, or an hour, or even longer.

Such whirlwinds love the hollow places. In a deep depression on the southern boundary of the land of Gilead, called el-Baq'ah, two to three miles wide by six long, surrounded on all sides by high hills, these little phenomena are almost always on exhibition in summer-time. They no sooner form on the rude rim of the basin than, the original current remaining at its first level, the twirl drops down till the plain is touched, when at once the whole affair is revealed by the ascending cloud of dust, which rises up and up and up, till the altitude of the hill-tops is somewhat overpassed, three hundred feet or more. On goes the whole pillar, to be dashed against the mountains of the other side of the basin. Sometimes these whirls are left behind, by the upper wind, to linger and play in the valley until they are fired out. Whenever the connection is kept up with the higher vortex, they seem to be fairly dragged over the ground, for the higher part is always in advance of the lower; but when they are lost altogether or the wind is gentle they keep an upright position.

What seems most remarkable is, they were present here late in the summer; when there was no appreciable wind on the heights. It was during that short lull after the dying away of western breezes and before the springing up of autumn siroccos; yet, though certainly there was not a breath of air stirring down in the basin, there were three or four of these whirlwinds scattered over its face—in the distance without apparent progression—lazily hanging in the air. These were not more than two in three hundred feet high—long, slender clouds, binding the earth with the blue heaven. Not stiff and straight, as those of a blow, they leisurely rose in curves and graceful turns. In this respect they resembled somewhat that variety of rocket called "serpents" in pyrotechnic displays, or more nearly those lines of light smoke pushing, waving up through heavy atmosphere from chimney-tops on a damp or frosty morning, when all around is still. At the top they were ill-defined, and so vanished in the air. How long they lasted I cannot tell. They were there when we went down in the hollow, and the same ones or others just like them were there when we went out up the other end. One that shuffled past not far away was nothing but a curl of fine dust. But what set and kept it going or what fed it along? Could it have been the heat of the sun alone?

Over on the borders of the desert, ten to fifteen miles east of Hasban, the whirlwinds are quite at home. From the time the western winds commence in May till they end in August, there was no day in which they did not revel over the descending Belqa. They could be seen from the little height on and around which Old Heshbon was built, far over the fields against the distant mountains, as steady shafts lifting up higher than the horizon, fading out against the sky. Whenever we were over there they were to be seen almost at any time, sometimes several in different directions. I often saw them start in a crook or twist in some wadi, keep in the alluvial soil, and then fly dancing on, augmenting in size and stature, over the arid waste of the northern headwaters of the Zarqa Ma'in. South of el-Mushetta and in the region of Ziza such airy convolutions were particularly frequent. They rose apparently to the height of from two to five hundred feet, in trunks of from twenty to fifty feet in diameter. Here they picked up plenty of loose earth and dust to give them substantial form. Onward they whirled further than we penetrated, probably until they broke on the further mountains. We never saw them come to an end, because the wind was strong on the plain and able to whisk them quickly away.

Now we are prepared to expect that the long wide chasm of the Jordan, from six to thirteen hundred feet deeper than the sea, may be the haunt of whirlwinds of the largest kind. And so it is. In summer the daily landward currents, in turning the crest of the range culminating between Hebron and Nazareth, give birth to many an aerial maelstrom in the profound depression beyond. In crossing the lower plain, or turning up or down under the influence of local currents, they sweep everything before them. On coming to the lake of Gennesaret or the Dead sea they are sure to raise water up to the clouds. Rev. Dr. C. S. Robinson, or other members of our party, can testify how, four years ago, when storm-bound at Tiberias, from our tent doors below the town we saw a waterspout rush down the lake, sucking up the waves in its march. This last autumn a party of tourists was drenched between Jericho and the Jordan by a passing waterspout. Of these whirlwinds two instances will suffice.

One day, in my searchings after Ramoth Gilead, I came upon a ruin called Khirbet Salhun, lying on the northern flank of Jebel 'Ansha', half way down to the river Jabbok. There was a little wind from the west—not enough to suggest the possibility of more. Wholly absorbed in the old stones, I saw nothing, thought of nothing else, till a sweeping, rushing sound suddenly began, grew rapidly louder, as by approach. Looking up, I saw the whirlwind column, endless on high, already upon me. The first impulse was to run; the second to stand it out, and thus have my wish, so often cherished, to get into one of these things to see what it was like. Fortunately my wish was not wholly gratified, for the central axis passed about thirty feet to one side. Fortunately, because the outer circumgyration carried me on several feet and nearly took away my breath. That inner portion would have hustled me along rather too unceremoniously. The core of the thing was one mass of spinning rubbish—from dust, gravel, etc., up to sticks, branches, and whatsoever the surface of the ground afforded—all flying far too fast for the eye to catch. Though it would seem as though the forward motion could not have been as rapid as the revolving motion, yet there was no apparent return in the stuff on the near side of the whirlwind, which was the backward side relatively to its advance. In spite of the violent circulation, everything was pushed forward; indeed it was this backward side which nearly took me off my feet forwardly. What there was a rattling, dashing, cracking roar, enough to deafen the ear. Anon it was gone on upward, to be gradually reduced by the rising mountain.

The other instance was one which occurred while we were encamped at Hasban. About two o'clock one afternoon I caught sight of a singular cloud away up the Jordan valley, just off the end of Jebel 'Ansha'. As this was in midsummer, when clouds are unknown in those parts, the semblance of such a thing was enough to attract attention. The first moment of real looking was sufficient to recognize a whirlwind of gigantic size. The cloudy object was the highest portion, enlarged into a funnel-shaped expansion. From the borders of this that haze the outline narrowed down concavely on each side into a comparatively slender, well-defined shaft, which dropped behind the nearest hills into the valley, out of sight. It must have rested on the plain. There it stood—motionless, because twenty miles away, a cloudy pillar, widening out near its summit into a nebulous inverted bell of a capital, high, very high in the air. Let us try to estimate how high. The point of observation was 2,860 feet up. The position of the whirlwind was about half way between the mountains on either side the great valley. That upper expansion was fully as lofty as and apparently more lofty than Jebel 'Aasha' on one side, and the range of which Mount Ebal is a portion on the other. These mountains are from 3,400 to 3,500 feet in altitude. Again, this spot, not far from half way between the Lake of Gennesaret, 659 feet below, and the Dead sea, 1,317 feet below the sea-level, must have been near Ford Damieh, which we found to be 1,124 feet below the Mediterranean. The whirlwind, therefore, was nearly or quite a mile high. Its spiral shaft cannot be supposed to have been less than from 300 to 400 feet in diameter. Its power must have been extraordinary. In the course of half an hour all had drifted away.

Such an affair as this was far greater than is required for Elijah's whirlwind. His may have been no more than an ordinary example of its class. My object is to show what is the character of whirlwinds in that part of the world, that they are of frequent occurrence there, and that the natural agent employed in Elijah's translation was common to the place.

It was well known to Elijah, Elisha, the sons of the prophets at Bethel and Jericho, and all the world, no doubt, for fifty men of the sons of the prophets went down to the border of the second terrace of the Jordan to witness the departure, knew of the approaching separation, and knew of the means to be employed—that "the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind," "that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head today." They all comprehended perfectly well what a whirlwind was from frequent sight and common experience. After the event it was natural for them to fear the whirlwind had taken up the beloved prophet and cast him upon some mountain or in some valley, as objects thus taken up are always dropped again. And here we find this very agent existing still.

It was no great whirlwind which parted the prophets asunder as they walked near one another; but this familiar phenomenon was the natural instrumentality. The supernatural part was the "chariot of fire and horses of fire." What they were we shall never be told more fully. The same were present when the eyes of the young man were opened, "and he saw; and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." Manifestly they were not the incandescence of that chemical change called fire, for this would have been perceived without a special opening of the eyes. The sons of the prophets, who beheld the translation, understood them to be "the Spirit of the Lord." They were allied to the great sight which Moses turned aside to see when "the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush; and he looked, and behold the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed." "Who maketh his angels spirits, his ministers a flaming fire."—Independent.

A Mormon Scheme.

THE ORDER OF ENOCH.

A New York Times correspondent thus refers to the above-named order of Mormonites, established by Brigham Young for the purpose of massing the property of the Mormons together and starving out the Gentiles:

"His scheme is to start co-operative institutions for almost everything, from providing food to erecting houses. He proposes to build a mammoth hotel, capable of feeding the entire population of the city, and boarding in this all Enochites and their families, so that they may be able not only to live cheaper, but also to become better acquainted with each other. This movement is meeting with strong opposition, for those who have accumulated wealth after a long and tedious struggle with poverty do not care to place themselves and families at the mercy of a priesthood for a livelihood. Both sides of the question were forcibly presented to me one afternoon by the opposite representatives of the faith. The Enochite was an Englishman of the lower order, and he informed me that a grand scheme was now afloat to raise the church beyond the power of her enemies, as all were to unite and place their funds in charge of the church, to be used according as the Lord should direct the prophet by revelation. I asked him if he believed in this revelation business, and he promptly recited quotations to prove why he should. Five minutes after leaving this individual I met a prominent member of the church, and asked his idea of Enoch. "Well," said he, "I've been a Mormon since the year before Joe Smith was killed, but I swan, though I'm a Yankee myself, if I'm a-going to work all my life and then give what I earn to a lot o' Vermont Yankees to live on, and let my own children suffer." I asked him if his opinion was general among the better classes, and he said it was; that very few, if any, would join Enoch. These give the opinions prevailing here; but, notwithstanding the latter's assertion, I believe the influence of the prophet is yet too great to be opposed with success, so he will be able to induce the great mass of the lower classes to join it."

CLERICAL DRESS.—At a recent pastors' meeting, held in New York, the question of clerical dress came up. Some advocated the wearing of the black robes, others denounced the garb as unseemly and ritualistic. There is nothing more arbitrary than "clerical dress." In England there are two styles—that of the Establishment, that of the Dissent. You can tell a High Churchman from a Low Churchman, the one wearing a cravat without a collar and the other a collar without a cravat. The great army of the Establishment wear a dress as distinctive as the "Queen's Own." The dress of the Dissenters and that of a servant in a nobleman's house are alike, both wearing white cravats and black coats and pants. Spurgeon wears this dress with this difference: Instead of a swallow-tailed coat he wears a black frock. In the days of Stillman and Baldwin ordained ministers of all denominations wore the bands, and a large portion of them wore the black gown. In their own pulpits Drs. Baldwin and Stillman preached in full canonicals. Bishop Asbury, the first American Bishop of the Methodist Church, traveled over the savannas and waste places of the South, and performed his functions in that wild region in full Bishop's dress. The white cravat was not a clerical badge. It was worn by all gentlemen—judges, lawyers, merchants, scholars, as well as by clergymen. No one was dressed without a white cravat. When other classes abandoned the distinction, the clergy refused to follow the fashions, one Brooklyn pastor astonishing his audience by coming into the pulpit in a white scarf and red necktie.—Examiner.

KENTUCKY UNIVERSITY, located on the estate of Ashland, the homestead of Henry Clay, and old Transylvania University, contains four hundred and thirty-three acres of splendid grounds, and offers unusual attractions to students. There are six distinct colleges in operation, with about thirty able professors, with fine libraries, apparatus, etc., with very cheap fees for tuition and boarding; and, with the advantages of its farm and shops and its military department, this institution affords peculiar facilities, especially to the poor young men of the South and West, to qualify themselves for almost any business or profession of life. We advise all to send for a circular.

CO-EDUCATION.—The experiment of co-education is no longer an experiment. In the presence of each other, young women are stimulated to greater intellectual development, and young men are inspired to a rarer gentlemanliness of conduct. Their honorable rivalry in the school-room is a motive to broader scholarship and more liberal attainments; and in this scholastic union they get a proper and ample preparation for their life-work. Eminence College has the right to claim much credit for being one of the leaders in the way of testing and proving the value of the co-education of the sexes. For catalogue address W. S. Giltner, president, Eminence, Kentucky.

THOSE desiring a good school for their boys, located in the country, where they will have every comfort of a home, would do well to correspond with Rev. B. H. McCown, at Anchorage, Kentucky. The doctor only takes a limited number every year, and has usually more applications than he is willing to accept. Forty years of teaching give him an experience few possess.

FIFTH CINCINNATI INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION.—The fifth Cincinnati Industrial Exposition will commence September 2 and close October 3. The buildings will be open for the reception of goods from August 3 to September 1. At this late day it is hardly necessary to argue the advantage of these exhibitions to manufacturers and inventors. Americans who exhibited machinery, etc., at the Vienna Exposition are already reaping the benefit of European orders for their productions.

The success that has attended the commissioners of these exhibitions is due, first, to the indefatigable energy and sound common sense that have marked their work; and, second, to the fact that not one penny of profit or benefit accrues to any individual or stock corporation out of the moneys taken or held by the managers of the expositions. This is the fundamental idea of the whole enterprise. The profits come to the whole people of the city and suburbs in the way of increased development of industrial interests, permanent increase in the accommodations which the several buildings afford, and the improvement and adornment of the grounds.

The board of commissioners, who are in fact a board of trustees, holding the property, and receiving and disbursing funds as such, consists of fifteen members, five being from the Board of Trade, five from the Chamber of Commerce, and five from the Mechanics' Institute of Ohio. They perform their duties, which are often arduous without compensation of any kind, and, their year having come to a close, transfer the property, which they hold in trust, to their successors.

In brief, the enterprise, after four years without a dollar in money to begin with, has been $15,339.89 in debt, and buildings costing $57,377.57, or about ten times the amount to show for it. If that is not success, sound financial success, what is?

The premium list has been increased to eighty-four classes—six more than last year. One of these is for fire engines and apparatus, another for ladies' furnishing goods. The natural history department has been divided into three classes, and to the fine arts department one has been added. The number of premiums offered is over one thousand—nearly three hundred more than heretofore. For further particulars see advertisement.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL DISCOVERY OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,

FROM

The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a running sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is

Raw and Inflamed,

your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the acrimonious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

THE MEDICAL DISCOVERY

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly, DONALD KENNEDY.

The Child's Corner.

DAISIES.

BY RUTH ARGYLE.

Do you think God sends the daisies,
Making bright this world of ours,
Just because the laughing children
Love the darling little flowers?

Does he form the tiny blossoms
With such thought'ul care and pains,
Simply for the childish fingers
To make into "daisy-chains?"

Does he keep them fresh and fragrant,
Sprinkle them with early dew,
To reward bright eyes that seek them
All the golden summer through?

Can he know how we would miss them
Should they once their time forget,
How our hearts would ache with grieving
And our cheeks with tears be wet?

Yes, my darlings, God the Father,
Bending downward from the skies,
Scatters here and there the daisies,
Gleaming forth like starry eyes:

For he knows the little children
Love their tender beauty so,
That their restless feet will wander
Where the dainty blossoms grow.

Lovingly he watches o'er them
As he watches over you,
Guarding them with sweet affection
All the happy summers through.

The Young Spaniard.

A writer in the Christian tells the following story of a boy in Madrid who died at the age of fourteen years. He says:

The lad died of what is called the black smallpox, the same terrible disease which carried off Mr. G., after six days' illness. Feliciano, being very strong, resisted it for sixteen days, and at one time there was hope that he might live, but God willed it otherwise, although prolonging his life, or rather retarding death, for a reason which I explain afterward.

The manner in which he was brought to the school was strange. The father, a real Christian man, read in El Cristiano the advertisement of the opening of the boys' school, and both he and his son were seized with a desire that the latter should enter it. They then lived in a little village in the province of Avila, the father being engaged as a colporteur in the service of the British and Foreign Bible Society, at a salary of about £50 a year. So strong, however, was his desire that the son should come to the school that he agreed to pay £20 a year toward expenses, and the lad was sent to Madrid and entered the school, and, as soon as we came to our present home, also boarded with us.

He was a bright, pleasant-looking fellow, active and healthy, not specially gifted, nor yet very studious, except in one book—God's book; for this he had a real love. The knowledge he had of the Bible was surprising.

For a short time he and two other boys held a daily prayer meeting in his bed-room, but from various circumstances it was given up. But he was a member of the boys' weekly prayer meeting, and his prayers were always touching. He had a strong, somewhat stubborn temper, and it was, if I remember rightly, in the last meeting he attended that he prayed: "Lord, change my temper." His desire was to be an evangelist, and to go on foot, as the Master of old, from place to place, preaching the gospel. Yes, we were training him for the service of the Lord on earth, but God had better things in store for him, and for us; without knowing it, we were preparing him for the immediate service of the Lord in heaven.

He took part in the usual Christmas festivities, and his present was an English Bible. Four days afterward he was taken ill. At first it was hoped that it was only fever, but soon the sad fact became evident that it was smallpox of the worst kind. God was very merciful to him; he sent him a kind and good nurse, and, while separating him from others in the house, he had a nice, well-ventilated room. All that could be done was done; he had the assistance of Dr. Jelly, the English physician, but the terrible disease ran on in its course, till the once bright eyes were closed in darkness (he became blind,) and the voice had gone to a whisper, and the pleasant face and features had become black and repulsive. While watching him one night he said to me: "To-night I shall sup with Jesus." On another occasion I asked him:

"Do you love Jesus?"

"Yes."

"Does he love you?"

"Yes."

"Suppose he were on earth, would you give him a kiss?"

"Ten thousand," said the dying lad.

"But would he give you one?"

"A million," was the prompt reply.

Wonderful! Almost prostrate in mind and body, he can still declare that he loves Jesus much, Jesus loves him more; Jesus' love to him is a hundred-fold more than his love to Jesus.

To my frequent inquiries, "Shall I pray with you?" there was always a nod or a whispered "Yes," and to the last he knew the sound of my voice. His evident attachment to me touched me to the depths of my heart.

When he was taken ill his father was communicated with, but day after day passed and no reply came. Meanwhile, "Father, father," was a frequent word in the boy's mouth (the mother was dead.) Twenty-four hours before the son died the father arrived, having traveled three days and nights to come. He came in bitterness of soul; the lad was his only son, and he had an intense desire that he should grow up to serve the Lord. For the whole time he had been praying that he might see the face of his son once more, and God had kept the boy alive that the father's prayers might be answered. He saw his son alive, spoke to him, aided him, and finally put his body into the coffin. "Dear son," he said, "look to Jesus." And to myself he added: "The boy is not mine, but the Lord's." "Give me a Bible," he said when he left the room of the sick one; "in it I find all my comfort."

Some of his school-fellows gathered round the grave, and the voices sounded sweetly in the open air as they sang one of the hymns in which Feliciano had often joined; there was a short and feeling address from Pedro Castro, a prayer and another hymn, and then we left the grave, sad yet joyful, for we knew that our little brother was with Jesus, and why should we mourn?

The Five Offerings.

LEVITICUS VII, 37, 38.

We learn in these two verses the names of the five great offerings which the Lord commanded the Jews to make to him. These were the "burnt offering," the "meat offering," the "sin offering," the "trespass offering" and the "peace offering." To understand all about them you must read the chapters which precede the verses in this book.

The burnt offering must be either a "male from the cattle" or a "male from the sheep or goats," or, if from the fowls, it must be from "turtle doves or young pigeons." Nothing else would do for this offering.

For the meat offering the people must bring "fine flour," mingled with oil and made fragrant with frankincense. This was an offering of praise, and its sweetness went up to God. This was a most holy and sacred offering.

For the peace offering the people could bring a male or female from the herd or from the flock, but it must always be without blemish. No poor goat or calf would do; it must be round and fat, without a blemish. The very best must be given to the Lord in the blessed offering of peace. And no man is happy, or can be, who gives other than the very best to God.

For the sin offering the people were to bring "a young bullock," without blemish, unto the Lord, and the offerer was to bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord, and lay his hand upon the bullock's head and kill him. When this was done, a priest might take the blood and dip his finger into it and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord, before the vail of the sanctuary. The ceremonies were very solemn and impressive during this offering. But when they were ended, he who had obeyed the Lord, to him it was said: "It shall be forgiven you."

For the trespass offering the people who brought it were commanded to bring a ram without blemish out of the flocks. Its value was to be estimated by the priest. It mattered not whether a person sinned through ignorance or not, when he knew that he had sinned he must make as free as possible full restitution. The law of the Jews was very careful in all this. It will well pay us to look over this lesson and its explanation a great many times. In the Christian life we need the instruction that is given here. No man was happier than he who, having found his sin, confessed it with the proper observances. No man can be happy with a sin in his heart, or with sins blotting his life.

The goat, the lamb, the dove, the bullock, all were types of the great offering made for sin—Jesus Christ. While we may study these things with profit, let us never be forgetful of him who is our Prophet, Priest, Sacrifice and King.—Little Sower.

Taking Off the Shoes.

In Syria the people never take off their caps or turbans when entering a house or visiting a friend, but they always leave their shoes at the door. The reason is that their floors are covered with clean mats and rugs, and in the Moslem houses the men kneel on the rugs to pray, and press their foreheads to the floor, so that it would not be decent or respectful to walk in with dirty shoes and soil the sijjady on which they kneel to pray. They have no foot-mat or scrapers, and it is much cheaper and simpler to leave the shoes, dirt and all, at the door.

It is very curious to go to the Syrian school-houses and see the piles of shoes at the door. There are new bright red shoes and old tattered shoes, and kob-kobs and black shoes, and sometimes yellow shoes. The kob-kobs are wooden clogs, made to raise the feet out of the mud and water, having a little strap over the toe to keep it on the foot. You will often see little boys and girls running down steps and paved streets on these dangerous kob-kobs. Sometimes they slip, and then down they go on their noses, and the kob-kobs fly off and go rattling over the stones, and little Ali or Yusef, or whatever his name is, begins to shout, "Ya Imme! Ya Imme!"—"Oh, my mother!"—and cries just like little children in other countries.

But the funniest part is to see the boys when they come out of school and try to find their shoes. There will be fifty boys, and of course a hundred shoes all mixed together in one pile. When school is out the boys make a rush for the door. Then comes the tug of war. A dozen boys are standing and shuffling on the pile of shoes, looking down, kicking away the other shoes, running their toes into their own, stumbling over the kob-kobs, and then making a dash to get out of the crowd. Sometimes shins will be kicked and hair pulled, and tarbooshes thrown off, and a great screaming follow, which will only cease when the teacher comes with "Asa," or a stick, and quells the riot. That pile of shoes will have to answer for a good many school-boy fights and bruised noses and hard feelings in Syria. You will wonder how they can tell their own shoes. So do I. And the boys often wear off each others' shoes by mistake or on purpose, and then you will see Selim running with one shoe on and one of Ibrahim's in his hand, shouting and cursing Ibrahim's father and grandfather until he gets back his lost property.—The Women of the Arabs.

"WHAT do you do without a mother to tell all your troubles to?" asked a child who had a mother of one who had none. "Mother told me to whom to go before she died," answered the little orphan. "I go to the Lord Jesus; he was my mother's friend, and he is mine now."

Farm, Garden and Household.

Bee Pasturage.

Undoubtedly the linden or basswood produces the most honey of all other trees we have in this country. This tree should be largely propagated.

The next best is the whitewood or poplar. This tree is not so easily propagated, and would not pay to cultivate for honey alone. But wherever it grows naturally bees gather large quantities of honey.

The soft maple is another very desirable tree to propagate, for ornament or shade, and it produces both pollen and honey early in the season. On this account it should be reckoned one of our best trees to cultivate for bees.

Willows of all kinds produce both pollen and honey early in the spring. The common yellow willow, in particular, should be cultivated for the honey and pollen it produces. The willows are grown from slips, and should be extensively propagated.

Currant bloom of all kinds produces honey if the atmosphere be favorable when in bloom. The English or black currant is far the best variety for producing honey. I have frequently seen bees light on a single cup of this flower and fill their honey-sacks before leaving it, and yet there would be enough left apparently to load another bee. I would recommend bee-keepers to cultivate largely of this variety, as it produces honey early and of the very best quality. It is readily propagated from slips.

Alsike or Swedish white clover makes the very best bee pasturage, equally as good as common white clover, and should be cultivated largely. It makes excellent honey and the very best pasturage for all kinds of stock. Stock of all kinds will leave any other herbage to graze on Alsike.

Buckwheat, in districts where it produces honey, is a very desirable crop for later pasturage. In my locality it yields no honey.—N. Benedick, in National Bee Journal.

RUTA BAGAS.—This is a very productive root—nutritious, easily kept and useful for almost every kind of stock. It keeps perfectly until late in the spring, and we had it this year until after the first of May. Early sowing gives an opportunity of resowing if the fly attacks the crop. A good rich sandy or a loamy soil is the best for these roots, and it must be thoroughly prepared. Fine bone superphosphates, ashes and plaster, are all good applications where the soil needs the addition of some fertilizer. The ground ought to be plowed deep and finely harrowed. The seed should be sown in drills about thirty inches wide, and the plants thinned to stand ten to twelve inches apart. If any vacancies occur they may be filled by transplanting. The seed is most conveniently sown by a hand drill. This opens a furrow, sows the seed and covers it by one operation, besides marking the next row. The seed may also be sown from a bottle, or dropped with the thumb and finger in holes made with the hoe. Sow as soon after plowing as possible, as the seed germinates quickly and is more apt to escape the fly, from which it is safe so soon as it gains its rough leaves. If attacked by that pest, dusting with ashes, unslaked lime, plaster, etc., when the dew is on the plants, is a benefit. As soon as the plants appear, run the cultivator through the rows. Continue this and work between the roots with the hoe until the leaves of the adjoining rows interfere.

VEGETABLE ENEMIES.—To destroy bugs on squash and cucumber-vines, dissolve a tablespoonful of saltpeter in a pailful of water; put one pint of this around each hill, shaping the earth so that it will not spread. Use more saltpeter if you can afford it; it is good for vegetable but death to animal life. The bugs burrow in the earth at night and fail to raise in the morning. It is also good to kill the "grub" in peach-trees—only use twice as much, say a quart or two to each tree. There was not a yellow or blistered leaf on twelve or fifteen trees to which it was applied last season. No danger of killing any vegetable with it; a concentrated solution applied to beans makes them grow wonderfully.

CHEAP VINEGAR.—Take a quantity of common Irish potatoes, wash them until they are thoroughly clean, place them in a large vessel and boil them until done. Drain off carefully the water that they were cooked in straining it, if necessary, in order to remove every particle of the potato. Then put this potato-water in a jug or keg, which set near the stove, or in some place where it will be kept warm, and add one pound of sugar to about two and one-half gallons of the water, some hop yeast or a small portion of whisky. Let it stand three or four weeks, and you will have excellent vinegar, at a cost of six or seven cents per gallon.—Journal of Chemistry.

DUCKS.—There are no birds kept about the farm more agile in destroying insects and larvæ, nor more indefatigable in hunting them, than young ducks, and, from their apparently unlimited powers of digestion, they are far better placed among vines and other plants infested by insects than young chicks. Thus they will readily supply themselves with all the animal food they require at no cost to the owner, and save a large amount of trouble in this direction.

BEST TIME TO HANDLE BEES.—Charles Dodant, in the American Bee Journal, says: "Remember that the handling of bees is more easy between ten in the morning and three in the afternoon, in a clear than in a cloudy day, in spring and summer than in fall, and with Italians—pure Italians—than with black, gray or hybrid bees. As to gloves, I cannot advise their use, for they are inconvenient. It is better to leave them alone and to learn to handle bees."

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE NEXT TERM OF THIS VENERABLE INSTITUTION OPENS ON THE FIRST MONDAY IN OCTOBER, 1874.

Faculty.—REV. C. G. ANDREWS, A. M., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Political Economy and International Law; REV. A. R. HOLCOMBE, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Adjunct Professor of Natural Science; G. H. WILEY, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages; T. S. JONES, M. D., Professor of Natural Science; REV. H. D. NORSWORTHY, A. M., Principal of the Preparatory Department.

Charges.—Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in College, $60; Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in Preparatory Department, $40; Contingent expenses, $5. A matriculation fee of $5 must be paid on entering any regular college class. One-half the charges must be paid when the student enters; the other half on the beginning of the second term, March 1.

Board.—Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be had in the best families for $20 per month. Day-boarding with the same families, $12 per month. Rooms provided in the dormitories free of rent. Board to be paid in advance at least one month.

Location.—This Institution is located in the lovely village of Jackson, about twelve miles from Bayou Sara, in a grove of pine, magnolia, oak and beech. The location is remarkable for its beautiful woodlands, its bland and delightful atmosphere, its pure water, its unrivaled healthfulness, and its cultivated and refined society.

When Founded.—The college was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and ceded to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845.

Alumni.—Its Alumni numbers two hundred and three, and they are to be found in the most honorable and useful stations in the land.

Apparatus and Cabinet.—The college possesses a valuable set of Philosophical, Astronomical and Chemical Apparatus, and also a well-selected Mineralogical and Geological Cabinet. The apparatus includes a Theodolite, Sextant, Compass, Chronometer, Atwood's Machine, Whirling Tables, Electrical Machine, Air Pump, various combinations of the Mechanical Powers, Batteries, Chemical Tests, etc., sufficient for a thorough and extended course of observations and experiments. Steps have been taken by the Board of Trustees to put these in thorough repair.

Literary Societies.—There are two regular Literary Societies connected with the Institution. These are of great utility to young men acquiring a liberal education—improving them in the art of public speaking, making them in some degree familiar with the proceedings of deliberative bodies, and in cultivating systematic business habits. Each Society has a convenient hall and a well-selected Library—about one thousand six hundred volumes each, which, added to the College Library of two thousand volumes, makes over five thousand volumes in the college.

Buildings.—The Trustees are determined to continue the repairs on the buildings till completed. The grand Center Building is a noble specimen of architectural beauty and adaptation to the purposes of its erection. The wings, built of solid brick, present each a front of two hundred feet, with upper and lower galleries the entire length, supported by Tuscan columns, and with the center making in the perspective a continuous front of seven hundred feet.

Preparatory Department.—In the Preparatory Department students are fitted for regular college classes, or may obtain a thorough English or commercial education.

The Faculty.—Its Faculty are men of experience and success in teaching.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE,

STAUNTON, VIRGINIA,

will begin its Twenty-fifth Annual Session SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

REV. W. A. HARRIS, D. D., President, with an able corps of twenty-three teachers and officers. Modern languages taught and spoken by European teachers. Music by seven professors and teachers, among whom are two of the most cultivated teachers of vocal music in the South.

This is one of the healthiest climates in the world. Its marked effect is the rapid promotion of the physical health and vigor of our pupils. Those who come here from the South, with feeble constitutions, chills and climatic diseases, are entirely restored.

Buildings elegant, fanned by the purest breezes, and commanding the most magnificent rural and mountain scenery, making it one of the most delightful college homes in the Union.

The last session one hundred and eleven young ladies attended this school, as boarding pupils, from fifteen Southern States.

Extracts from Testimonials.

From Bishop D. S. Doggett, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, located in Staunton, Virginia, under the presidency of Rev. W. A. Harris, is, in my judgment, one of the best institutions for young ladies in the South. I have occasion to know and appreciate its value by the advantages enjoyed by one of my daughters, now a pupil there. It possesses all the facilities of a thorough female education. Its personal accommodations are all that can be desired for health and comfort or taste. No location could be more eligible, no scenery more magnificent, no atmosphere more salubrious. It is now in a state of great prosperity. I do not hesitate to recommend it to the patronage of all who wish their daughters to receive the benefits of a useful and ornamental culture.

D. S. DOGGETT.

From Bishop E. M. Marvin, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute is an honor to the church. Instruction is thorough. All classes stand high. Its noble advantages are offered of a very high order. The most talented professors are employed, and neither pains nor expense are spared to make this department eminent. The school is very prosperous, and deserves to be so.

E. M. MARVIN.

From Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, deserves the brilliant success it enjoys. It has a good corps of teachers, a beautiful situation and excellent management. Having had a daughter under Mr. Harris' care during the present session, my observation leads me to believe this school to be one of the best of female seminaries which adorn our State. FRANCIS H. SMITH.

The surrounding mountain scenery is grand, the buildings commodious and elegant, the grounds incomparably beautiful.

The patronage for last session represented twelve Southern and Western States and England.

Domestic department under the supervision of the President and wife. Healthfulness unsurpassed.

Opinions of Distinguished Patrons and Friends.

Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

"I confided to the care of the President, during the present session, two of my daughters, with very sanguine hopes of their improvement in health and culture. My expectations have been more than realized. From experience, then, as well as prepossession, I cordially and confidently recommend Martha Washington College to parents who are seeking the best advantages for their daughters."

Prof. L. C. Garland, LL. D., University of Mississippi.

"Martha Washington College possesses remarkable advantages as a seat of learning. * * * The corps of instruction is composed of ladies and gentlemen of ability, fidelity and professional skill."

Bishop H. N. McTyeire, D. D.

"If I were to search the land around I know not another Abingdon—beautiful for situation, healthful, accessible. Its social atmosphere is of the right sort for a female school—salubrious, not fast, conservative, well toned. The perfume of the 'Old Virginia' lingers about it still. Your immediate site, your grounds, please me more than any I have seen. Your shade-trees and your walks and your wide piazzas linger in my mind."

Faculty of the University of Virginia.

"We cordially recommend Major R. W. Jones, a Master of Arts of this institution, as a gentleman peculiarly well fitted by capacity, culture and experience for the conduct of an advanced seminary for young ladies."

THE LAST AND MOST ABSORBING SENSATION OF THE DAY IS, TO USE A THEatrical phrase, "a great take." Everybody, to be en regle for the season, and to avoid the proscription of imperious fashion, must have

A CONVERSATION FAN.

No family circle is complete in social diversions and entertainments without one, and in order to enjoy the pastime it should be distinctly understood that the answers do not numerically follow the questions, but to spice the amusement an answer must be looked for that will afford a fitting response to an interrogatory.

Where a direct answer is not to be found to a direct question, it will be discovered that it furnishes the sequel to a sustained conversation, so that couples can carry on a tete-a-tete, which they may not wish to make audible, by silent indications of numbers.

THE CONVERSATION FAN

is an infallible remedy against dullness, breaking the spell of silence by a suggestive inquiry, furnishing congenial pleasures for an evening's entertainment, and opening up a novel and ingenious method of whiling away agreeable hours at home, in the promenade, at a party or private gathering.

ONLY TEN CENTS A FAN.

TO THE SUFFERERS

WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this dreadful disease, with this medicine; and, what astonishes most, the patient recovered by the use of a single bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not recover by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not afflicted with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

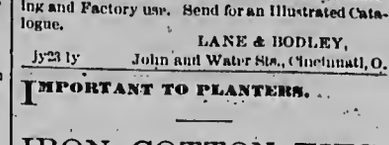
IMPROVED



EAGLE COTTON GINS,

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a finer or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the twenty-fourth instant:

Louisiana and Mississippi.....bales...	439
Lake.....	10
Mobile.....	257
Texas.....	25
Total.....	731

On Saturday the dispatches from Liverpool and New York were regarded as rather encouraging, but not of a character to have much influence, and the movement exhibited but little variation, some desirable kinds being scarce and in request at full prices, and other kinds being neglected and easy. The sales embraced 4,000 bales. On Monday the demand continued limited, and the few sales reported, embracing only 125 bales, were without any quotable variation. Low middling sold at 15¾c., and middling at 16¼c., which is below our recent quotations. The tenor of the New York and Liverpool dispatches was not calculated to have much influence. On Tuesday there was no material change except rather more inquiry and sales of 375 bales. Low middling sold at 15⅝, 15⅞ and 16c., the last for high style, showing no variation, but the lower grades could not be sold unless at a reduction, to which we have conformed our quotations.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 900 bales, against 1,250 for the corresponding time last week and 1,400 the week before. The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,213,393 bales, against 1,232,383 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 223,864 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 112,711 to France, of 116,589 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 31,987 to Great Britain. Advertisers' Directory

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to seek the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

GREENSBORO DISTRICT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—The District Conference for this district has been appointed to be held at Ivy Creek church, Autauga county, including the fifth Sunday in August, beginning on Thursday, the twenty-seventh. Conveyances will be provided for the delegates at Burnsville, on the Selma, Rome and Dalton railroad, at eight o'clock on Thursday morning. The trains meet at this point daily. It is very desirable that the official members generally attend, and be on hand at the opening service at eleven o'clock on Thursday morning.

A. H. MITCHELL, P. E.

THE Brandon District Conference will be held at Scotland chapel, Neshoba county, Mississippi, August 27, 1874. Those brethren not having private conveyances will notify Rev. W. A. Ray, at Watkinsville, Neshoba county, Mississippi, in due time, who will furnish conveyance at Forest on the morning of the twenty-sixth of August. A full attendance is desired, as business of importance will be before the Conference.

F. M. WILLIAMS, P. E.

DELHI DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—The Delhi District Conference will convene at Delhi, Louisiana, September 3, 1874. Rev. B. F. Alexander is appointed to preach the opening sermon.

C. W. CARTER, P. E.

THE Eufaula District Conference, Alabama Conference, will be held at Perote, Alabama, commencing on Wednesday night, August 26. Introductory sermon will be preached by Rev. T. W. Dyer. Members of the Conference will report to Rev. W. S. Turner, at the parsonage, on arriving at Perote.

W. H. ELLISON, P. E.

CAMDEN DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—Ministers and delegates coming to the District Conference at Camden by boat will be conveyed from Wilcox Landing on Wednesday and Thursday, August 5 and 6.

A. M. JONES.

THE District Conference of the Camden district, Alabama Conference, will be held at Camden, Alabama, August 5-9. Opening sermon on Wednesday night, August 5, by the Rev. M. M. Graham.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

OMAHA, NEB., July 29.—The heavy wind and storm of Saturday night fortunately blew the grasshoppers out of the State, and much produce that had been given up will be saved.

PITTSBURG, July 30.—The United States signal observer at this point says there was no indication of the storm on Sunday night, except a slight change in the barometer.

The weather observer rejects the theory of a water-spout, and thinks that, owing to the peculiar geological formation of this section of the country, the disaster could be caused at any time in these sections by what he terms an extraordinary rain-fall.

GALVESTON, July 30.—A special to the News, dated Fort Worth, July 29, says: Colonel Stewart, a member of the Legislature from Falls county, has just come in from Wise county, and says it is reported that there was another fight near Jacksboro, on Friday last, between the Montague Rangers, under Captain J. Kardt, the Tenth United States Cavalry, and the Indians, the latter numbering five hundred.

Captain J. Kardt is reported to have lost twelve rangers killed and several wounded. The cavalry lost several men, including their commander, who was killed.

The report says that the combined forces were driven back to Jacksboro. Colonel Stewart states that a religious meeting near Decatur, on Sunday, was forced from Indian rumors to adjourn to the town for protection.

WASHINGTON, July 31.—The following is the telegram of Governor Ames, of Mississippi, to the President, in relation to the Vicksburg troubles:

JACKSON, MISS., July 29, 1874.

To President U. S. Grant, Washington, D. C.:

I regret to inform you that I find, upon returning here, that a serious and alarming condition of affairs exists at Vicksburg. Infantry and cavalry organizations exist, and it is reported that a number of pieces of artillery have been sent to the city, and these bodies are organized and armed without authority, and in violation of law assume to be the guardians of the peace.

This is a political controversy. On the one side the Democrats, represented by the whites, say they fear frauds on the part of their opponents. The Republicans, consisting mainly of the blacks, claim they fear frauds and also violence on the part of the Democrats. At one time a collision and bloodshed was feared by all; now by the Republicans. But by the Democrats it is not believed, only because they have become masters of the situation. It is they who oppose the presence of troops at this time.

Of the cause of this lamentable state of affairs it is useless for me to speak. I only seek peace and protection for all.

Can there be any objection to troops being sent there? No harm can result. Their presence may do great good. It may save many lives. Even one would more than compensate for the harm, if any, which I do not see. Will it not be the least of evils to have troops there for any emergency?

ADELBERT AMES,
Governor of Mississippi.

The following reply was sent to Governor Ames to-day:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 31, 1874.

To Hon. A. Ames, etc.:

The contents of your dispatch have been submitted to the President. He declines to move the troops, except under call made strictly in accordance with the terms of the constitution.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

ST. PAUL, July 31.—The grasshoppers are rapidly moving eastward in myriads, and will doubtless reach Wisconsin, perhaps Illinois, before the flying season is past. They are reported to-day as very abundant at a number of points far east of the former scene of their activity. Even in this city several gardens were overrun with them. All the damage the late-comers can now do is to deposit eggs, which will hatch out millions of devastating insects another year. It is now absolutely certain that other States than this will complain of the scourge next year, and if clouds of insects continue the present movement even the central and Eastern States will not escape.

ST. LOUIS, July 31.—Great quantities of grasshoppers have appeared in western and southwestern Kansas, and are destroying everything before them. Much damage and distress is apprehended.

NEW YORK, Aug. 3.—Frank Walworth, the parricide, has been removed from Auburn prison to the prison asylum for the insane convicts, on the advice of the board of examining physicians.

ST. PAUL, Aug. 3.—At Faribault yesterday, in the Bishop's cathedral, an insane divinity student named Nims attempted to assassinate Bishop Whipple. Just before the sermon Nims advanced rapidly to the chancel, but before a pistol which he held in his hand was discharged the bishop seized him and forced him into a chair, where he was disarmed. The cause of the attempt was the refusal of the bishop to ordain Nims a priest, because of his unsound mind.

VICKSBURG, Aug. 1.—The city election to-day passed off quietly; not a single disturbance of any kind to mar its peacefulness. Both the whites and blacks polled their full registered strength. In the Third Ward some of the leading negroes attempted to induce their followers to leave the polls, but any excuse for such a course was withheld by the whites. About forty negroes voted the white ticket, and four whites voted with the negroes.

The whites elect their entire ticket by three hundred and fifty majority. This is their first political victory since 1861. The Stars and Stripes, and every available piece of bunting, have been thrown to the breeze by the whites in honor of the victory.

LOUISVILLE, August 4.—Reports from the State indicate that Jones, the regular Democratic nominee for clerk of the Court of Appeals, has been elected by a large majority.

LITTLE ROCK, Aug. 4.—Colonel S. C. Faulkner, one of the oldest citizens of the State, and author of the famous "Arkansaw Traveler," died to-day, aged seventy-one years.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, July 29.—The Morning Post reports that the German government is actively engaged in negotiations aiming at the suppression of the Carlist insurrection.

It has exchanged opinions with the Russian government, but the Czar is opposed to intervention.

Germany is now trying to bring about the concurrence of government powers in recognition of the Spanish republic.

BAYONNE, July 29.—Two Republican columns, marching to the relief of Olit, were repulsed with heavy loss.

BERLIN, July 29.—Provincial correspondence expresses the hope that the visit of the German squadron to the coast of Spain will effect a happy change in Spanish affairs. The North German Gazette states that the squadron will leave British waters about the beginning of August for their new station.

PARIS, July 31.—In the Assembly to-day the question of recess came up for debate.

The motion to adjourn from the sixth of August until the thirtieth of November was finally carried by a large majority.

FORT GARY, MANITOBA, Aug. 3.—Lord Gordon shot himself on Saturday last, at his residence in Headingly, in the Province. Two English detectives arrested him, and he promised to go quietly with them if they would not go through the United States. While in his room preparing for the journey he blew his brains out with a pistol.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE ISLAND.—The little Island of Nicoros, in the Grecian Archipelago, is suffering under a "constant supply" of boiling water.

"Some months ago, says the Pall Mall Gazette, the inhabitants were seriously annoyed by a series of earthquakes, which did much damage, and culminated in the bursting open of the summit of the highest peak in the island, and a flood of steam and boiling water, which at one time led to the apprehension that not only the whole island would be destroyed, but every living thing contained in it. The mountain, however, suddenly ceased to boil over, and it was hoped that for some years at least there would be no recurrence of this disagreeable phenomenon. These hopes were unfortunately dissipated the other day when the mountain resumed its objectionable practices, and emitted such volumes of boiling water that the position of the island has become almost unbearable. To add to their discomfort, the ground is convulsed with earthquakes, and at the date of the latest advices the people had taken to the open fields, where they were safer than in their tottering houses. A scarcity of provisions is added to their other troubles, and without houses, without food, and with the prospect of being either scalded or starved to death, the condition of the good people of Nicoros is at the present time by no means enviable."

A VOLCANO IN NEW HAMPSHIRE. Somebody has just recollected that North Carolina is not the only Atlantic State which can claim a volcano, and cites the phenomena exhibited nearly a hundred years ago in New Hampshire, in one of the hills of the Connecticut valley. The scene of this curious phenomena was West River mountain, which rises to the height of nearly one thousand feet, on the east bank of the Connecticut, in the towns of Hinsdale and Chesterfield, in Cheshire county, in the southwest corner of the State, and a few miles from Brattleboro, Vermont. Loud noises having been heard, one of the inhabitants, a Mr. Barrett, went to investigate, and found a hole forced through the side of the mountain near the top—evidently, as he thought, by the action of internal fire. The hole was about six inches in diameter. A pine-tree, which stood near it, was in a great measure covered by a black mineral substance, forced violently out of the hole, and consisting chiefly of melted and calcined iron ore, strongly resembling the scoriæ of a blacksmith's forge. It was forced out in a state partly liquid, and driven with such violence against the tree as not to be separated without difficulty. The Rev. Dr. Dwight, president of Yale College from 1795 to 1817, published an account of the affair.

THE Cape Fluttery Indians are now engaged in halibut fishing and sealing. Ten miles out to sea is an immense halibut bank, to which the Indians repair in large canoes, and it is a poor catch if they do not return with from fifty to one hundred fish in each canoe. The sealing season is nearly over.

ADVICE which, like the snow, softly falls dwells the longer upon and sinks the deeper into the mind.

A Race of Educated Man-Eaters.

The beautiful Island of Sumatra, two and a half times as large as all New England, is inhabited by four million five hundred thousand people, among whom hardly any missionary effort has as yet been made. Parts of the island are in possession of the Dutch, and other parts were inhabited by independent tribes or principalities, among whom the Batta people or Bataks were represented as the most intelligent and interesting—a tribe or nation of about three hundred and fifty-nine thousand souls, occupying the interior central portion of the island, immediately south of the Achinese, with whom the Dutch are now at war.

The Bataks were generally mild and inoffensive, though fierce and revengeful in time of conflict. In one respect they were the most remarkable people anywhere to be found—educated cannibals. They had a written language and books, and most of the people could read, and yet they were cannibals. They had an alphabet of their own, consisting of twenty-two letters and five vowel points. Their language was quite original, yet simple and melodious, much like the Italian, written like our own, from right to left, easily learned, and much used in all that region.

Their books are written on the inner bark of a species of palm-tree, their pen consisting of a mere twig or a fiber of a leaf; their ink made of a certain gum and the juice of the sugar-cane. For ordinary purpose they also write upon smooth bamboo sticks, sometimes two inches in diameter and two or three feet long, making a letter, it might be, big enough to knock a person down—convenient for lovers delivering their own epistle, if they should not be graciously received.

Their literary works are really numerous and not very wise, consisting largely of books of divination, jugglery, and the most absurd fables about the origin and destiny of the great Batta nation. It will be seen, therefore, that they had some ambition. If they should receive the gospel, they were in a good position to give it to others. Beside, much of the island was nominally Mohammedan, and so far as the Dutch had sway they had agreed to protect the Mohammedan religion from all assault or interference from without; but the Battas were simple heathen and beyond Dutch control. They believed in two gods—one above and one below, one good and one bad—but their ideas were very vague and uncertain, and they felt bound to pay far greater homage to the evil spirit than to the good, as they had most to fear from him.

And yet, strange enough, French infidelity and infidel books had found their way into that country. The missionaries met with one of the former, who denounced the Bible as "all a lie," although he confessed that he never read it, but boasted that he had read Voltaire's insane tirade against it no less than ten times.

And, after all, this cannibalism was of a modified type. They did not seem to feed on human flesh for mere love of it, nor was it their settled habit, as with some other people, who have regular cannibal feasts; but portions of the flesh of their enemies, slain in war, were tasted, as if in revenge, or as denoting complete triumph. The missionaries were, however, invited to one feast, for which a boy seven years of age had been seized and killed and roasted to be eaten for the sins of his father, committed six years before the little fellow was born. The missionaries respectfully declined the invitation.

MILTON'S DAILY LIFE.—Milton lived in a small house in London or in the country in Buckinghamshire. Of all consolations, work is the most fortifying and the most healthy, because it solaces a man, not by bringing him ease, but by requiring effort. Every morning he had a chapter of the Bible read to him in Hebrew, and remained for some time in silence grave, in order to meditate on what he had heard. He never went to a place of worship. Independent in religion, as in all else, he was sufficient to himself. He studied till midday; then, after an hour's exercise, he played the organ or bass violin. Then he resumed his studies till six, and in the evening enjoyed the society of his friends. When any one came to visit him he was usually found in a room hung with old green hangings, seated in an arm-chair, and dressed quietly in black. He had been very beautiful in his youth, and his English cheeks, once delicate as a young girl's, retained their color almost to the end.

Few men have done such honor to their kind. Amidst so many trials (a scrivener caused him to lose $10,000; at the Restoration he was refused payment of $10,000 due from the excise office; his house was burned in the great fire; when he died he only left $7,500, including the produce of his library) a pure and lofty joy, altogether worthy of him, had been granted to him; the poet, buried under the Puritan, had reappeared, more sublime than ever, to give to Christianity a second Homer.—Taine.

ALAS! the niceties of a spruce understanding, and the curious nothings of useless speculation, and all the opinions of men that make the division of hearts, and do nothing else, cannot bring us one drop of comfort in the day of tribulation.—Taylor.

How Crude Rubber is Collected.

Greytown, Nicaragua, is the principal port for the export of India rubber on the coast. It is collected by parties of Indians, Caribs, or half-cast Creoles, seldom by Europeans, to whom the dealers, who are also storekeepers, advance the necessary outfit of food, clothing and apparatus for collecting rubber, on condition of receiving the whole of the rubber collected at a certain rate. The rubber hunters are termed Ulleros (Ule being the Creole term for rubber.) A party of Uleros, after a final debauch at Greytown, having expended all their remaining cash, generally make a start in a canoe for one of the rivers or streams which abound on the coast, and, having fixed on a convenient spot for a camp, commence operations. The experienced rubber hunter marks out all the trees in the neighborhood. The rubber tree is the Castilloa elastica, which grows to a great size, being on an average about four feet in diameter, and from twenty to thirty feet to the first spring of the branches. From all the trees in the almost impenetrable jungle hang numerous trailing parasites, etc.; from these, and especially the tough vines, are made rude ladders, which are suspended close to the trunks of the trees selected, which are now slashed by machetes in diagonal cuts from right to left, so as to meet in the middle and central channels, which lead into iron gutters driven in below, and these again into the wooden pails. The pails are soon full of the white milk, and are emptied into larger tin-pans. The milk is next pressed through a sieve, and subsequently coagulated by a judicious application of the juice of a Bejuco (an Apocyna) vine. The coagulated mass is then pressed by hand, and finally rolled out on a board with a wooden roller. The rubber has now assumed the form of a large pancake, nearly two feet in diameter, and about a quarter of an inch thick, on account of which they are termed tortillas by the Uleros; these cakes are hung over the side poles and framework which support the rancho, which is erected in the woods, and allowed to dry for about a fortnight, when they are ready to be packed for delivery to the dealer.

Making the Children Good.

"Aunt Emma," said a little girl, putting her arms about her aunt's neck, "won't you please make me good again to-day, as you did yesterday?"

"I don't understand you, Katy," she replied.

"Don't you remember yesterday how you talked with me so nicely, and told me about the pictures in my book? You were so good, auntie, you made me good. Won't you please make me good again to day?"

The words had a little sermon for the heart of the one addressed. Perhaps she remembered other days in which she had not helped to make the children good. At least it suggested a method of securing that desirable end, which she had not much considered before. Any one who has dealings with children can easily satisfy themselves of the soundness of little Katy's philosophy. All their surroundings, even to the papering on the walls, help to make them better or worse.

A lady in the city had her nursery in the rear of her house. From the windows the children looked out upon the unsightly walls of discolored brick and dismal chimney-tops, and in cloudy days a gloom seemed to settle down over all the little court. The children were peevish and very troublesome, and the mother's courage and patience were often well-nigh exhausted. After a time the family removed to a pleasant dwelling on Logan square, and now the nursery was an airy front room. It was surprising to see the magical "change in the children's tempers," which quickly followed this change in their surroundings.

It is a pity that so many of our Sunday school rooms are so gloomy and unattractive, while the church is supplied with all modern luxuries and adornments. The Bible truths which children learn are unconsciously but surely associated with the place in which they learn them, and many of these impressions are anything but cheerful.

The teacher of a troublesome scholar or class may find in little Katy's comment a hint to aid her in her difficult task. First of all, arouse yourself from a listless attitude and manner, and for the hour exert all your powers to interest them. If you fail in this you fail in everything. Win their attention, and then their hearts, and you can do what you will with them. But never imagine you can "make them good" by harsh censure and cold indifference.—Sunday School Times.

Lord Brougham and the Yorkshire Primitive.

At an Assize trial at York, when the late Lord Brougham was H. Brougham, Esq., barrister at law—the learned gentleman was counsel for the prosecution—there was a plain Yorkshire Primitive Methodist called up as a witness for the defense. The prisoner was charged with stealing fowls, and the counsel for the prisoner seemed likely to get little aid from his witnesses, until the Primitive was examined. After he had given his evidence, however, so clear and honest did it seem, that the learned gentleman on the other side found it necessary to do his best to invalidate it. Hence he began: "Well, sir, do you ever go to meeting?" "What is that to thee?" said the witness. "If thou'st a mind to come over to our house thou'll get to know." "But," said Brougham, "don't you have prayer meetings in your house occasionally?" "Well, what if I have?" replied the witness. "I reckon there's no harm in praying, is there? Happier if the like o' thee were to pray more and talk less: ye'd get better on." "But," said Brougham, "I believe you belong to a people called Ranters, don't you?" "Well, if I do," said our friend, "am I any worse for that? Prithee to what set do you belong?" "Nay, answer my question," said the learned barrister, beginning to get rather annoyed with the witness. "Don't talk in that way to me. I ask you again, sir, and I have a right to ask you, have you prayer meetings in your house?" "Well, then," said the witness, "I have, and very good meetings they are, and I would like to see such as thee at them." After some further banter, the credibility of the witness seeming to rest on a solid foundation of good sense and personal piety, and not being provable to be doubtful as the consequence of a weak mind and religious enthusiasm or partisanship, the learned counsel closed his cross-examination, and our friend took the credit for having for once actually beaten Harry Brougham.—From "A Book of Marvels," by Dr. Antliff.

THE ADULTERATIONS OF TEA.—This subject, which all—whether chemists or not—are interested in, has been very exhaustively dealt with in a paper read before the Chemical Society of London, at a recent meeting, by Mr. J. Bell, of the Laboratory at Somerset House. He says that tea is adulterated to a very large extent, not only with leaves of various kinds, including exhausted tea-leaves, but also with inorganic substances, such as quartz, sand and magnetic oxide of iron; these latter substances are rolled up inside the leaf, and one sample of green tea examined was found to contain no less than 20 per cent. of quartz and 8.6 of the magnetic oxide. The latter may readily be separated by grinding up the tea and removing the magnetic oxide with a magnet. The facing employed for green tea usually consists of French chalk and Prussian blue. In the preparation of exhausted tea-leaves, they are rolled up with gum-water, and then dried, catechu being added in some cases to restore the astringency. The article known as the "maloo mixture" consists essentially of exhausted tea-leaves. In searching for the presence of other leaves than those of the tea-plant the best method is to heat a small quantity of the suspected tea with water until the leaves are sufficiently softened to admit of being unfolded. They should then be spread out on a piece of glass, and carefully examined as to the nature of the serratures and the character of the venation, also the form of the cells of the epidermis and the stomata, and the peculiarities of the hairs as shown by the microscope. The essential differences which the tea-leaf presents when compared with other leaves were minutely described. The chemical composition of tea was next discussed, the amount of lignin and of tannin being very important.—Popular Science Review.

DO THINGS IN TIME.—Only two or three inches—that was all. If the switchman had moved the track only that little distance all would have been right. But he forgot, and the train that was passing the station ran furiously into the heavy freight-cars and dashed itself to pieces.

"What was the cause?" everybody asked, when the news of the great accident spread about town.

"Oh, a switch was out of place," was the answer. "The switchman was careless. Perhaps he was drunk."

How true it is, as Solomon said: "There is a time for everything!" If we do not attend to it in time, it is just as bad as not to do it at all.—Presbyterian Sunday School Visitor.

WHEN Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, condemned to death in the reign of King Henry the Eighth, was on the way to the scaffold, he opened the New Testament that he carried in his hand, and his eyes fell upon the passage: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Whatever fear had been in his heart vanished, and he went forward with a light step, repeating: "This is life eternal." Death had lost its terrors listening to the voice of his Master.

CHRIST, untried and untaken up in the power of his love, kindness, mercies, goodness, wisdom, long-suffering and greatness, is the rock that dim-sighted travelers dash their foot against, and so stumble fearfully.

AT THE recent Unitarian festival in Boston they seem to have had a good time in the way of speeches, although the speakers were unaccountably hard on themselves. The Christian Register has a full report, from which we take the following. Governor Bagley, of Michigan, said:

When I was running for Governor I was advertised to speak in a town that I knew very well, and where the people all knew me. I got up before a crowded house and said to them that they knew a great deal more about the political questions that were agitating the people of the country at that time than I did; they all knew me as a business man and a merchant, and that I could not make a speech. I had tried once or twice, and the first had been so poor, and the second so much poorer than the first, that I didn't want to speak. But they insisted that I should go on, and I went on and made a speech. It was a short one. After I got through an old man of the opposite political faith climbed up on the platform and said: "Mr. Bagley, I am going to vote for you. You are an honest man. You told the truth." (Laughter.) "You said you should make a poor speech, and I never heard such a poor speech in my life." (Laughter.) From that day to this I have never made an effort to make a speech.

Rev. J. C. Kimball said:

One evening, when I was preaching in the town of Seattle, on Puget Sound, I noticed a man come in about the middle of the service, and struggle about half way up the aisle, where he took a seat. Nothing occurred until the end of the services, when we took up a contribution, which custom was most religiously observed. I noticed then that this new-comer, instead of putting his contribution into the hat, stalked up the aisle, and with a loud, ringing sound planked his half dollar on the table that served me for a desk and said: "Do you have any school in this church concern, that you have been preaching to us about?" I thought he meant a Sunday school, and that he was so charmed with our glorious Unitarian faith, and especially with the admirable way in which it had been presented, that he wanted that his children should at once have the benefit of it; so with the utmost suavity in my speech and countenance: "Oh, yes, we have Sunday schools in our older churches, and we mean to have one here as soon as we can get fairly going." "Oh, no," said he, "I don't mean Sunday schools; I mean them kind of colleges that educate you fellows to do the preaching; do you have them?" "Oh, you mean theological schools?" I thought he had a boy old enough to be educated for the ministry of our glorious faith, or that under the inspiration and enthusiasm of the service he might even feel himself called of the Lord to go forth into the world, even at his period of life, and preach the gospel; so, feeling an interest in the man, and sympathy for him, I said: "Yes, we have two most capital ones." "Well," says he, "you take this half dollar, and tell your chaps that sent you out here to send you to one of them to learn a little grammar forthwith (laughter,) for such a murdering of the English language as I have heard to night I never listened to in all my life." I saw then that it was not really so much bad grammar, but some one else's bad whisky; but, notwithstanding, I took the money with a smiling face, and assured him that it should be devoted to the desired end, and with an expression of satisfaction on his face, such as a man shows who has done a praiseworthy act, he struggled down the aisle and left the house.

PUNCTUALITY.—General Washington was a pattern of punctuality. When he engaged to meet Congress at noon, he never failed to be at the door of the hall just as the clock was striking twelve. He always dined at four o'clock; and, if the guests whom he had invited were not present, the dinner went on precisely at the appointed hour, without waiting for them. Washington would make no apology, but simply remark: "Gentlemen, we are punctual here." When those people got another invitation to dine with the President they would be sure to be in time.

A person had a pair of beautiful horses to sell, which the President wanted to buy. Five o'clock in the morning of a certain day was fixed as the time for Washington to see them; but the horses were not brought till quarter past five, when the owner was told that the President had been there at the hour appointed, but had gone away. The man thus lost a good chance of selling his horses by his delay of one quarter of an hour.

THERE is nothing so remarkable in man as his power of concealing mental torture. What is unsaid is ever nearest and greatest. The soul is beset by some hideous remorse—consuming care, warnings of disease, fear of death, rejected love, vile pecuniary distress, or the anguish of anticipated shame. The dark thing is not merely in the background; its presence is never withdrawn, its grasp never wholly relaxed, it occupies the citadel of thoughts and feelings; and all that is beyond its sway is but outlying and unconsidered precincts. Meanwhile the man plays his part in society as other men do—is polite, gay, affable; and, if he is really a strong and able person, is as much like his ordinary self, himself before this dark thing had any hold upon him, as it is possible to be.—Arthur Helps.

ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

Our Savior in the garden wept,
And thrice he prayed to God;
And while his tired disciples slept
He sweat great drops of blood.
But though the cup his Father gave Must never pass him by,
Yet strength to bear and power to save
Are sent him from on high.

His servant prayed that God would take
The piercing thorn away;
Yet, though he prayed for Jesus' sake,
The thorn must stay.
And yet, in answer to his prayer,
A heavenly grace was sent,
To help its agony to bear
Until his life was spent.

A child is bearing in his hands
A little pack of ware,
But by his side his father stands,
And guards his child with care.
So while the father stands so near,
To shield from rude alarms,
His child, when faint or tired with fear,
He gathers in his arms.

'Tis thus our heavenly Father cares
For those who love his name:
He hears their oft-repeated prayers,
And loves them just the same.
But those who have some thorn or load
That seems too hard to bear,
He guards them all along the road
With a more watchful care.

Charity.

One of the dearest words that was ever spoken or written is love. That is what charity means. It is called charity sometimes in the Bible. It is dear to us, because it represents that which saves us—saves us, more than anything else, from sin and wretchedness, and makes life comfortable to us. "Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity." Love is divine. It is the most glorious attribute of the Deity. Men who have it are just that much divine, and those who have it not are just that much devil. Charity—love—that tender regard which one person is capable of feeling for another—is the chief instrumentality which God uses to bring a lost world back to himself. He does this in two ways—by showing us that he is love, and by begetting his love in others who co-operate with him.

1. "God is love." If the opposite could be written of him, what imagination could depict the ruin of the world? In every dispensation of God we have beheld in him only love. True, the rigors of his justice seemed sometimes to be severe, but he was no more just than love required. There was never a time when he could not say: "What more could I have done to my vineyard that I have not done in it?" Mankind have always had confidence in God's love, especially in the extremity of their sorrows. Job, in the bitterness of his grief, did not forget to cry out: "Oh, that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his seat!" "He would put strength in me." The consummation of his love to man was revealed in his incarnate Son on earth. He did not give him for the Jewish race only, but for the world. God left none without witness of his love. Many others, beside the Persian magi, saw his star in the east, in one way or another. God loved the world, and gave his Son for the world. That is what saves the world. Every act of Jesus was divine—divine because it was full of love. Scoffing infidels, while they dispute his divinity, have to confess that he was a good man. If they could only get rid of their own selfish ambition enough to see that "love worketh no ill," then they might feel that Jesus' love attested his divinity—showed that he was the Son of God. And what was that condescending advent and glorious triumph in the world for? To gratify ambition? To show the superiority of the power of the light over the powers of darkness, and set up in heaven a grand pageant to prove to a wondering universe that God is ruler over heaven, earth and hell? No. He came to seek and to save that which was lost. Can nothing be divine that does not display the immediate signs of power? Jesus had might, but he had love which was superior. Jesus was the Savior, alike when he disputed with the Jews and when he healed the sick; when he preached to the multitudes and when he sympathized with individual souls; when transfigured on the mount and when before Pilate's bar and on the cross, because the grandeur of love was in it all.

2. We can bring this subject nearer home to us. It is admitted there is something strange and incomprehensible about the love of God, especially as displayed in his Son. All the magnanimity of earth dwindles into insignificance by the side of it; yet it is our pattern. God even tells us to be perfect, as he is. As he causes the sun to shine upon the evil and good alike, and sends rain upon the just and the unjust, so must we be indiscriminate in bestowing our affections. Why is this? It is to save men. "God so loved the world" that it might not be lost. This love, for this purpose, "God commendeth to us." He does not commend it to us because it is something nice, pleasant, a goodly sort of a gift for ornament, but because it is that all-powerful principle upon which the salvation of the world depends. Heaven depends on love. Hell begins and continues throughout eternity in those hearts where love never rules supremely. We can never co-operate with God in saving souls without this principle, which he has so wondrously displayed throughout the ages. Christians ought to think of this more. There are many who try to be more just than God. Their skirts are often "clear" long before they have done one lick of work in the right spirit. They have not experienced the first impulses of that charity which is with all long-suffering and patience. It is a long time before God calls his Spirit away from men. Many times, perhaps, long after we have given them up to hardness of heart and reprobacy of mind, and almost wished they were damned, does he linger about them, crying: "How shall I give thee up?"

No one is fit to be a steward of the manifold grace of God who does not feel the sway of love over all his thoughts. The absence of love converts men into enemies of souls and of God. Eloquence, knowledge, sacrifices, will not substitute it. All these may be made the tools of selfishness, and when worked by selfishness they become the engines of destruction. Love shirks no obligation and applies no doubtful expedients. The philosophy of love is simple. It seeks another's good, not for self-gratification, but for his sake alone whom it seeks to bless. And if it seeks to bless him for his own sake, how can it ever become his enemy? One can ardently love that which contributes only to his own good, and just as ardently hate it when it fails to do so; but one can never hate another whom he loves only for that other's sake. We cannot wish harm of him of whom we at the same time wish the greatest good. When we have a normal regard for self, we cannot, under any circumstances, wish harm of ourselves. And this is precisely the ground of that divine law which requires us to love our neighbors as ourselves. It is impossible to do our full duty to him unless we do. We have no right to do our neighbor harm; but unless we love him we are sure to do him harm. Therefore is charity so great. "Charity never faileth." M.

Ecclesiasticism.

MR. EDITOR: What smut is to wheat, or rust to oats, this big word is to true religion. Like all parasites, it steals the blood intended to feed the body to which it has stuck fast. The dead body, when embalmed, retains something of the lineaments of the living subject, and so does this thing preserve some semblance of the divine principle it pretends to represent. Then it runs back so far into the centuries for its paternity that the moss of age gives it an air of venerable respectability; and who dare say aught of respectability? And then polished decorum adds its approval; and who so daring as to gainsay decorum? Were not councils, assemblies, convocations, bishops, learned doctors of divinity and profound scholars its nurses? Who, then, art thou that hast the temerity to profane so reverend an object? We admit that we feel somewhat crampish, and experience weakness, but hope to revive, owing to a wonderful elasticity of vital power given us. The truth is, we know these appendages and nurses to be children of an evil parentage, and therefore are not scared.

There is a form of ecclesiasticism we admire, because it looks to doing good, and thereby gives token that it is born of God and not of man; but that kind so current in this day we are doubtful of, and seek to keep far away from its bad spirit. Men have garbed it in fine clothes, and it looks pretty; but, like the Greek horse, it carries death concealed. Let us get close up to it, and view it in its working dress. Here is one who has been bound to its service. Respectability and polished decorum are well marked in all his motions, and there is a rich odor of culture about him. The outside is truly beautiful; but how about the inside? Well, that is hard to answer. Fruit is the test of the tree; and may not the aggregate actions of a man be the true test of his character and sincerity? Just watch this man covered over with the chain-mail of ecclesiasticism. He bows to you on the street, says kind things to you personally and of you to others; but the canons to which he has subscribed do not permit him to visit you, and add to your Christian growth, by converse on the matters of the kingdom, lest by so doing he should admit that you were equally authorized with him to preach the word and administer the ordinances. You approach another, in humility of spirit, and tell him of destitution and moral darkness, and ask for some authority to sow the seed of life, in never so lowly a capacity. He answers with a sigh and a most gracious suavity of manner. Your report causes deep sorrow in view of the moral destitution of that field, but our standards of qualification are so high, and you, not being able to fill out the entire garment of our ecclesiastical make, must be content to keep your place, and lovingly submit to the wise dispensation of Providence. What Providence? Reader, answer, for we confess ignorance to do so.

Another appears. He talks sweetly, prays with you fervently, visits kindly, exchanges in preaching, works side by side with you, and acts like a true brother. At last we have escaped the circle and sweep of ecclesiastical magnetism! Not so fast, brother. Wait until, in the stated order, the emblems of a Savior's love are spread on the table, and then ecclesiasticism bids you take a back seat. Up to this point all was very good and proper; but just at this point somehow it turns out that you are not quite good enough to join with the brethren in honoring the same Lord you worship in common. And why not? Just because ecclesiasticism has put up bars to stop any such Christ-like intimacy. Verily, the devil is subtle above all beasts. When this anti-Christian spirit does not appear in the individual, it shows itself in other ways. It crops out in the phrases, "Our organization, our creed, our founder, the fathers," and similar pet terms, all of which are contrary to the explicit teaching of the word. We too often lose sight of the only Founder, Head and Father, in silly contention over mere human additions to the true creed—the only hope for humanity—Jesus Christ.

Why this evil has taken such deep root in the human heart that, when God's Spirit moves in power among the people, there are objections to the work, upon the ground that it is not according to the ordinary methods of grace. This is no mere imagination, but sober truth. Is it proper, is it according to the word?

No doubt exists in the minds of reasonable people as to the benefit of system in every human organization; but there should be grave doubt as to the propriety of substituting mere human rules, covered though they be with the dust of centuries of antiquity, for the plain teaching of Scripture, which says: "Ye be brethren;" "love one another." Though we be many members, yet have we but one Head. By this undue reverence for human regulations in matters spiritual, and the consequent necessity to defend them when assailed, we are led by the heat of contest to give them too much importance, and thus we hinder the onward march of the gospel, impede the development of spiritual life, and cause the souls of men to become lean and consumptive because of the tight lacing of this hard cord.

Let us seek to be incorporated into Christ, and aim for a high standard of judgment, and by much self-sacrifice and entire consecration incite in others a like course of action; open wide our hearts to receive the Spirit of love, and become tempered by its gentle influence to have charity and sympathy for all. INDAMORA.

Baptist Ways.

MR. EDITOR: On last Sunday I attended a Baptist Sunday school. I was at the same school just one month before. A gentleman—a member of the school—handed me each time a copy of their lesson papers, with the request that I should examine them. Their lessons claim to be of the International series. They take up different characters or persons of the Bible and give their history. The lesson for the present is on "The Life of Jesus," beginning with the first Sunday in July. It purports to be taken from the Gospel by St. Mark. I propose to transcribe their explanation, as they give it.

I begin with verse five, first chapter of Mark: "By the land of Judea we must understand the people of Judea generally. Baptized in the river Jordan cannot refer to either sprinkling or pouring; it must signify that John immersed. Verse six: With water and with the Holy Ghost. In the Greek it is in water and in the Holy Ghost, and should be so in our version. Ghost is the old English name for spirit. To be baptized (or immersed) in the Holy Ghost is to have copious influences of the Holy Spirit imparted to them. Baptized in water means to be immersed in water."

On verses nine, ten and eleven they proceed to say: "Jesus was baptized in Jordan. This, added to the meaning of the word, when properly translated, proves immersion to be the baptism to which Jesus submitted."

In the lesson for July 12 there is continual reference to baptism, evidently an effort to keep their argument for immersion before the minds of the scholars.

Now does this really belong to the International series, or are they palming off another cheat upon the people? Can you give the desired information? I say another cheat, because this is not the first. They have a Sunday school union, whose publications are frequently put upon the people for union publications. So was their Bible union claimed to be a union of all denominations. God knows I try to love all Christians of all denominations, and exercise charity toward them in our differences; but when I see the means resorted to by the Baptists to carry their faith, I can barely have charity. It amounts to trickery. Verily they compass sea and land to make a proselyte. I would not blame them for their pronounced denominationalism if they would only use fair means to maintain it; but taking advantage of the ignorance of country masses to deliver their dogmatic translations of baptize, and like habits of theirs, are highly reprehensible. Why insist upon this thing everlastingly, everywhere, as though it was the one thing needful? Ah! I apprehend, there is the rub. It is that immersion is essential to salvation.

Administration of Discipline.

MR. EDITOR: There is a great deal being said of late, especially since the General Conference, about the administration of discipline in the church. It is said, directly by some and indirectly by others, that the law as it now stands in the Discipline, chapter 1, section 2, page 27, ("do no harm,") is sufficient to exclude "dealers in ardent spirits" from the church. Now there is one thing I do know, and one thing I do not know. First. I do know that there are many in the Methodist Church South who sell liquors, wholesale and retail. Second. If one has ever been excluded for this offense, I do not know it. If there is one of the many readers of the ADVOCATE who has known an individual to be turned out of our church for the sale of ardent spirits, he will confer a favor by letting the world know it through the ADVOCATE. I do not mean to say that they should give the names of the parties thus expelled, but simply say that it has been done. If there is a pastor in our connection anywhere that has succeeded in expelling a "dealer in ardent spirits," with the law as it now stands, I am anxious to know how he managed the matter. I find such offenders in every charge with which I am acquainted. I hope to see the day when the church of my choice shall no longer be burdened with such opposers.

I will now venture to ask a few questions, which I trust you or some of your readers will answer speedily.

1. What shall I do with a member who plays cards "just for fun" or "pastime?" Of course some one is ready to say: "You must admonish them." But I have already done that, and they say it is no harm. What shall I do next? Well, perhaps some zealous brother is ready to say: "Expel them." Well, but suppose the society is small—only twenty or thirty members—and all of these either play cards, drink whisky, swear or dance, except one or two. Now tell me what I can do after admonition fails? Don't evade the question. Give me advice.

2. What can be done with those members who won't come to church after being exhorted to do so, or how long may one be allowed to stay away from public worship, on a trivial excuse, and retain membership?

3. How would you hold Church Conferences if the people or members won't attend on week-day, and won't stay long enough after public preaching on the Sabbath? Would it be proper to dispense with eleven o'clock preaching, once a quarter, and hold Church Conference? I know the Discipline says: "If on the Sabbath it should not interfere with the morning public worship;" but if this be the only time that you can get the membership, then one or the other duties must be left undone, and so the law is violated—either dispense with the morning preaching or not have any Church Conference.

AN UNDERGRADUATE.

News from Old Assyria.

Bibliotheca Sacra notices a remarkable work just published in England under the sanction of the Society of Biblical Archæology, which contains translations from the records of the Assyrian monuments and clay tablets. What is given in this volume, it says, "is only a specimen of what we may expect. It is difficult to persuade one who has not studied the subject of the vast amount of literature or records that has been recovered. Nor can we stop here to show how vast that literature is. Here we have an inscription of Khammurabi, who lived before the time of Moses. His inscriptions are written in Accadian, with a single fortunate exception which is in the Babylonian language, proving, for one thing, 'that the Babylonian language was the same in the days of Khammurabi as it was a thousand years later, in the days of Nebuchadnezzar.' He records with pride his efforts to supply his city with fresh water, and alludes to some other works, the object of which was to benefit his people (pages 5-8.) Very many of their kings were public-spirited men. Sennacherib took pains to 'care for the health of the city by bringing streams of water into it, and the finding of new springs' (page 29.) Again, he speaks of 'planting the finest trees,' and that he caused 'the uprising of springs in more than forty places in the plain.' These he 'divided into irrigating canals for the people of Nineveh, and gave them to be their own property' (page 31.) Again: 'To obtain water to turn the flour-mills I brought it in pipes from Kishri to Nineveh, and I skillfully constructed water-wheels.' He brought water from a river nearly two miles away 'into reservoirs, and covered them well' (page 32.) Assurbanipal took great interest in literature and learning, in preserving the old records, and in preparing new tablets for public use, corresponding practically to our public libraries (page 58.) Their building and constructing of palaces and public works was also very extensive. There is mentioned a 'hall of assembly,' which was a 'vast building' (page 27.) Yearly annals were published by authority (page 34.) Out of three palaces which Assurbanipal captured he collected 'thirty-two statues of kings, fashioned of silver, gold, bronze and alabaster' (page 86.) The Phœnicians were their shipbuilders: 'In Syrian ships I crossed the sea' [Persian Gulf] (page 43.) We notice the Semitic brevity with which they write or speak: 'Collect thy army! strike thy camp! make haste to Babylon! stand by our side! swear to help us!' (page 47.) Again: 'Go forth; the rebel state that does not obey me, smite it' (page 117.) They had poetical names for their rivers. The Tigris was 'The Stream of Fertility.' Elsewhere it is called 'The Stream of Gladness.' The Euphrates was called 'The Life of the Land' (page 30.) The prophet Joel's figure of a swarm of locusts is met with: 'Then, as a mighty swarm of locusts covers the face of the earth (so) in destroying multitudes they (the enemy) rushed against me' (page 47.) The building or dedication of palaces was celebrated 'with dancing and music, with joy and shouting' (page 104.) They used in war some composition like Greek fire (page 49.) Besides the longer inscriptions we have the private will of Sennacherib, private contract tablets, astronomical tablets, Assyrian calendar, weights and measures," etc.—Methodist.

Splendor and Distance of Sirius.

Mr. Proctor's "King of Suns" is the magnificent Sirius—that splendid star of the southeastern sky, whose fixed blaze is not diminished, even though he has receded from us, during the past century, more millions on millions of miles than we would dare to say. How must he have appeared—with what unutterable glory—to the first races of mankind?—to the human beings who preceded the ancient Egyptians? These latter worshiped Sirius.

He wore a red hue then—three or four thousand years before the time of Christ. His color has changed during the last four thousand years; and he himself is untold and untellable miles farther away than he was then; but such is his unimaginable distance that even his swift recession from this particular region of endless space seems to make, in any one century, no perceptible difference in his appearance.

Of one star alone, of all the infinite host outside of our solar system, the distance has been measured. It is Alpha Centauri. It is found to lie more than two hundred thousand times farther away than the sun. At this distance our sun would shine much less brightly than Alpha Centauri. But Sirius, that ineffable sun, is still more remote. He is at a vastly greater distance away; the best computations assign to him a distance exceeding that of Alpha Centauri five-fold to ten-fold.

Taking the smallest of the distances, it follows that if Sirius shone no more brightly than Alpha Centauri in appearance, he must nevertheless give out twenty-five times as much light. Yet a careful comparison of his brightness with that of Alpha Centauri shows that Sirius is about four times brighter. Therefore, says Mr. Proctor, in reality he must give out about one hundred times as much light as that great star.

In other words, coming back to our sun, it is found that Sirius shines in reality three hundred times more brightly than the sun. Proctor proves mathematically that if this be true (and he believes it,) then it follows that the volume of Sirius is about twenty-two hundred times as great as the sun's. Even the diameter of this King of Suns is between seventeen and eighteen times that of our sun.

Out of that kingly sphere, of light inconceivable, two thousand such orbs as our sun might be formed, "each fit to be the center of a scheme of circling worlds as important as that over which our sun bears sway." What must be the planetary system of Sirius?

A HORSE WITH A LONG MEMORY. Many years ago Mr. Abram Dodge, of the town of Ipswich, Massachusetts, owned a beautiful horse which was the pet of the family. He was admired by all who knew his playfulness and good qualifications. In the summer it was Mr. Dodge's habit occasionally to have a frolic with his horse in his barn-yard, then let him out alone, and he would go to the river, which was about one-third of a mile distant, where he could bathe, then go to a common and roll on the grass, then with the freedom of air start for home. His stable was renovated for him while he was gone, and his breakfast put in his crib. If he met his master he would shew some coltish pranks, bound for the stable, pull out the wooden pin that fastened the door with his teeth, and rush to the manger where he expected to find his food. One night the horse was stolen from the stable. At the expiration of sixteen years Mr. Dodge was at the tavern when a man drove a horse up to the door. Mr. Dodge at once recognized his horse, and he told the driver the reason for believing it to be his; the man told of whom he bought the horse, and said that he had owned him for several years. Mr. Dodge claimed his horse, and it was finally agreed that if the horse would, on being taken to his old stable, go through the habit of bathing, rolling on the grass, and pulling the pin from the stable-door, as above described, Mr. Dodge should have him. When the horse was let out into the old yard he reviewed the premises for a moment, then started for his old bath-tub, then for his green towel on the common, then to his stable, pulled the wooden pin, won for himself a good meal, and his old master his favorite horse. These facts are vouched for by reliable old residents of the beautiful, picturesque old town, and show conclusively the long memory of our noblest animal. Lowell Courier.

Obituaries.

DIED, of typhoid fever, on the fifteenth day of July, 1874, at her residence on Deer Creek, Issaquena county, Missis-sipi, Mrs. W. B BARNARD, formerly Miss Lizzie West, of Vicksburg. She was buried here in the family grave-yard, on Saturday, at five P. M.

The deceased was born and raised in this city, where she made numbers of friends by her many estimable traits of character. After marrying and moving to Deer Creek she became an earnest and devout Christian, having joined the Methodist Church. She leaves three children—two little boys and a girl—with a grieved and stricken husband to mourn her early demise.

THE following preamble and resolutions relative to the death of Bros. BENJAMIN MURRELL and HENRY M. NAFF, members of this Quarterly Conference, were adopted by the second Quarterly Conference of Lind Grove circuit:

Whereas, It has pleased almighty God, in his providence, to take from us our beloved brethren, who have been for years members of this body, and faithful as stewards of the church of God; And whereas, The providences of God are inscrutable, often striking us at points and in places the most tender, taking from us dear friends, and from the church some of its most useful members; therefore, be it

Resolved, That while we bow with submission under this affliction, yet are we deeply smitten, feeling that the church and Conference have sustained a great loss; but we rejoice to believe that they were both prepared for the summons that came, in one instance so gradually, and in the other so suddenly, from the Master.

Resolved, That we will ever cherish their names, their good works, acts of kindness and charity, associated with the spirit of a generous liberality, as evidence of their devotedness to Christ, and that they were ready for the solemn test when the announcement was made: "Give an account of thy stewardship."

Resolved, That we sympathize deeply with the families of the deceased, feeling that their loss is for greater grace to supply their every want.

Resolved, That a copy of the above be sent to the families of the deceased, and one also forwarded to the editor of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

JOHN W. BETHEA, son of John H. and M. J. Bethea, was born in Wilcox county, Alabama, April 8, 1858; joined the Methodist Church in 1872, being in the fourteenth year of his age; and died December 1, 1873.

Several months have elapsed since the subject of this obituary was conducted through the valley of death to the regions beyond; but time has not erased him from our memory. So striking was the closing scene of his earthly existence, and so happy were the associations that clustered around his passage from time to eternity, that the occurrence, though we mourn his departure, still strikes us with recollections of no ordinary character, and seems to have been but yesterday.

> In the soft season of his youth,
> In nature's smiling bloom,— he was called upon to close his eyes upon the transitory scenes of earth, to open them upon eternal things beyond the mystic vale; and, judging from the testimony that he left, we may well say: "No sooner had the objects of earth vanished from his view than objects supernal greeted his vision from the paradise of God." Like Paul, he desired rather to depart and be with Christ. A few days prior to his death he called his mother to his bedside, and, with countenance gleaming with delight, spoke to her of his "home up yonder." "This, dear mother, is my earthly home; but my good home, my eternal home is up yonder, where people never die. Will you meet me there?" Having received an affirmative response to this request, he called for the other members of the family, and addressed them in this admonitory and pathetic language: "Love the Lord Jesus Christ, and follow me, for I go to a glorious place." Yes, glorious in thy conception; yet "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of any man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." Go, disembodied spirit, wing thy hallowed flight to thy home above, and learn what that meaneth. J. S. PEAVY.

DIED, in Girard, Alabama, on the seventeenth of March, 1874, Mrs. CHARLIE ALMIRA MORELAND, wife of Mr. Robert Moreland. She was the youngest child of Hull and Patience A. Gates, and was born December 16, 1845.

She was early left an orphan, her mother dying when Mrs. Moreland was only eight years old, and her father several years previously. From the time of her mother's death until she was eighteen years of age she lived with a kind aunt, who resided in Meriwether county, Georgia.

Charlie Gates' character as a child was frank, generous and open-hearted. Well do I remember her bright and smiling face, her light and joyous laugh, her many pranks of mischief, and the ever readiness with which she sought pardon when unintentionally she wounded the feelings of others. She was naturally of a bright mind, and received a liberal education, graduating at the Southern Female College, LaGrange, Georgia, in 1863. Charlie inherited from her father's estate a large amount of property, but when the late war closed she found that nearly the whole of it was lost. Her noble nature would not allow her to live a life of dependence; therefore she spent not the time in useless repinings, but began to teach school, soon learned to love her work, and became an efficient and successful teacher.

She was converted and joined the Baptist Church in 1865, but several years afterward she united with the Methodist Church. She possessed many ennobling traits of character; was catholic in her views toward the doctrines of all religious denominations; was ever kind to the poor, ever willing to help the needy, and was a blessing to the sick and afflicted. On her sick-bed she shewed that she felt her dependence on the God of mercies—would ask an interest in the prayers of others, and would pray for those she loved. She leaves a kind husband and a little son, who is too young to feel the loss of a mother. A FRIEND.

MRS. ANN ELIZA, wife of Major Richard S. Allen, and daughter of John M. and Elizabeth Dupree, was born near Elyton, Alabama, December 12, 1822. She was happily married to Major Allen September 7, 1837. They emigrated to Mississippi and settled in Carroll county in 1858, where she fell on sleep with Jesus, April 14, 1874.

Sister Allen professed peace with God in her eleventh year, and soon after joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her evidence of acceptance with God was so much like the low whispers of calm breezes of summer's eve that she scarcely presumed to call God her Father, or herself his child. Day by day, however, the work of the Spirit continued in her heart, helping her to exemplify, in her walk, tempers and words, that the work of the Spirit was working its heaven. Four or five years after her conversion, in company with her devoted husband, she attended the preaching of the word in Elyton. The words of the preacher, who was Rev. William Vaughan, were made the power of perfect deliverance to her soul. She arose from her seat and rejoiced in God her Savior. From that day until her death, never were the graces of the Spirit more manifest in human experience than in Sister Allen. Religion was her constant theme. At home she lived and enjoyed that peace that surpasses human understanding.

When visiting, she feared not to speak of or declare her love for the Savior. To the sick and dying it was a privilege to recommend a Savior as the only solace for trouble. To the church she was a power for good, known only by those who can appreciate an active worker in the vineyard. She lived in the same community where she died for sixteen years, and those who knew her esteemed her as the highest type of woman. Forty years thus spent in devotion and faith perfected the grace of submission to the will of God. So in her affliction, which lasted over two months, no murmur was heard from her lips, but she was happy all the time, often giving God the glory so deservingly due his holy name for his presence in such trials.

Sister Allen delighted to entertain the preachers who called on her, making them feel that their visits and missions were welcome. She was one of the best of wives, a good and loving mother, and kind and attentive to her neighbors. Truly her death is a loss, but our loss is her infinite gain. T. C. PARRISH.

IF all men were to bring their misfortunes together in one place, most would be glad to take his own home again, rather than take a portion out of the common stock.—Solon.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 6, 1874.

GLINTS.

What pictore they—bits of crimson
Streaking the evening's gray—
Silver sleeve of the waters,
Tracked by the rising day?

Lances pointed with jewels,
Darting down from the stars—
Moon-face in a golden halo,
Peering through cloudy bars?

Glints, all, of the glory immortal,
As brooks slag of the sea—
Glints luring our vision to longing
For the radiant To-Be.

Come nearer, nearer, O brightness;
Make wider rifts in the blue!
Open, O cloud-portaled heavens;
Let all the glory through!

How a Submarine Diver Works.

We steam quietly down along the coast for nearly two hours, until we reach the wreck, which is indicated by the tops of three masts tapering a few feet above the surface. It is not certain yet that the vessel can be saved, and before work is begun a survey of her bottom must be made by divers. We have noticed a stalwart fellow on the tug, who has a courageous face and a thick-set frame. He is one of the divers, who of all seamen have the strangest experiences. They go deep beneath the sea, separated only by a thread from death. Watch this man as he dons submarine armor and prepares to descend into the water. Over a suit of thick flannels he puts a pair of trowsers and a jacket made from India rubber cloth. These fit close to the ankles, wrists and across the chest. Next he thrusts his head through a copper breast-plate provided with grooves, into which the body of the jacket is fitted and screwed down by an attendant. The head is now covered by a helmet, with a glass face, which is also screwed to the breast-plate—helmet and breast-plate weighing together about fifty-six pounds. Twenty-eight pounds more are added to this burden by a pair of shoes with leaden soles, and thus equipped the diver resembles neither man nor fish. A near-sighted naturalist might puzzle over him for hours without finding out to which species he belongs, so monstrous does he appear. And it is not surprising that the sharks themselves are afraid of the divers, and flee incontinently if one of their arms be outstretched.

The extreme weight of the diver is fatiguing above water, and he is glad to embark in the surf-boat, which has been launched from the tug to convey him nearer the wreck than she dare approach. A few strokes of the oar bring the surveying party directly over the sunken vessel, and the final preparations for the descent are made. You and I watch breathlessly, but the diver thinks very little about the danger of what he is to do. One end of a coil of strong rubber tubing is fastened to a mouthpiece at the back of the helmet, and the other end is connected with an air-pump in the boat. A hempen line is also secured to the outside of the helmet, and passes down under the diver's right side, within easy reach of his hand. Upon this tubing and line his life will depend. Four blocks of lead, weighing fifty pounds, are now slung over his shoulders, and a waterproof bag, containing a hammer, a chisel and a dirk-knife, is fastened over his breast. A short iron ladder is lowered over the starboard side of the boat, and the diver heavily climbs down each round. His weight causes the boat to dance and rock unsteadily. It is a very exciting moment for a novice, I can tell you! His comrades watch his movements attentively, and in another moment he is standing on the bottom round of the ladder. Two men stand by the handles of the air-pump at the other end of the boat. All is ready. The diver grasps a rope to prevent a too rapid descent; he releases the ladder, and the green water swells over and hides him.

Full fathom five he sinks; and, as the sea closes about him, the great weight of his armor dwindles away, and his movements are as free as an athlete's. Smoothly he descends, and soon feels his feet touching the hard sand. His foothold is unsteady; for, notwithstanding the weights attached to him, he is still too buoyant, and once or twice he pulls the signal line for less air. Well he knows that, unless the supply be rightly adjusted, he will either be suffocated or sent bubbling to the surface, feet first.

But his signals are heeded, and, as his tread becomes firm, he glances around him out of the little window of his helmet. Shoals of fish crowd inquisitively near, and some daringly rub their noses against his breast; but a wave of his hand drives them off in utmost terror. A few yards away lies the wreck, bedded in the sand, and plainly visible in the green light of the depths. There is as much light, indeed, as we have on shore during ordinary foggy weather. The diver approaches cautiously. His greatest peril is in the tangled rigging and splinters, which might twist or break the air-pipe and signal line. He does not move a step without first finding out whither it will lead him, and in good time he safely reaches the hull. Thus far he is pleased with the "job;" the water is clear and his feet do not sink into the sand. Now he begins his search for damages, and works for four or five hours without interruption, examining the vessel in every part, and humming a lively tune as he moves briskly about. The water is cold, and if he loiters he will be chilled; and, moreover, he understands that industry is the best cure for the loneliness of his position. At last he signals to ascend, and he is brought on board the tugboat. The master wreckers crowd about him for information.

"Can the vessel be saved?" "She can," he answers. The planking amidships, a few feet above the keel, has been torn away; but she holds together, and if the weather is fair she may be afloat again in two weeks. The diver, having removed his dress, then calmly sits down to rest, while preparations are making for another descent.

An old diver is as comfortable under water as above, and can do eight hours' work a day in seven or eight fathoms. As the business is precarious, however, the men are paid $150 a month, and supplied with board and lodging. Do they serve an apprenticeship? Not exactly that, but most of them have been attendants to other divers, and have picked up the secrets in that way. "I waited on a man myself, and didn't get promoted until I knew the service like a book," says the diver, as he rises and calls for his boy. "All ready, Tom? Excuse me now, sir; it's time to go down again." And so he leaves us.

Two other men accompany him in his next descent, and, after they have been down for an hour or two, they signal to the men in the boat, and the heavy cable that we have seen is lowered to them. In their curious dress they work together with a will, and drag the massive links of iron underneath the hull of the ship—one length amidships, a second length astern, and a third length forward. This is slow work, and before it is complete night has set in, and the divers are brought to the surface. Betimes next day it is resumed, and, when the center of each great chain is right under the keel, the pontoons are towed over the wreck. Meanwhile constant communication is established between the men below and the men in the boats, by means of the signal line. Once in about four hours the divers come to the surface for fresh air and food. But these pontoons—what are they? Let us pause a moment and glance at them. They are built of wood and painted black. The largest measures one hundred and twenty in length, eighteen feet in width, and fourteen in depth. Those selected for the present case are much smaller, and three are stationed at each side of the wreck to buoy her. In each pontoon there are several wells or holes running through the center, from deck to bottom. Into these the divers insert the ends of the three cables, which are drawn upward by hydraulic power. This part of the work costs severe effort and much time, and when it is done the injured vessel, as a doctor would say, is in the fair way to recovery. The cables are drawn up through the wells, link by link, and are tightened gradually, until the wreck lifts. She rises slowly, and the pontoons groan from the weight bearing upon them as they are drawn nearer to her. For some time yet she is out of sight; but at last her deck is seen dimly through the waves, and soon afterward it is above water. The wreckers, as we observed, are impassive in their manner; but they cannot repress their enthusiasm over the success, and two or three of the more excitable burst into cheers.—The Coast Wreckers, in St. Nicholas for June.

A Rival to the Great Strasbourg Clock.

One of the most wonderful clocks ever constructed has been recently completed by Karl Ketter, a German miner of Pennsylvania. He was occupied three whole years in its construction, during the last of the three working at it day and night, and often so absorbed in his enterprise as to be mindful of both food and sleep. But his efforts were crowned with complete success, so that he has recently been exhibiting the most wonderful timepiece ever constructed, and the whole work was performed with no other tools than two common jackknives. The clock is eight feet high and four broad, has sixteen sides, and is surmounted by a globe, over which is a cross. It has four dial-plates, all carved in curious, emblematic figures of most unique design. One of the dials shows the day of the month, another the day of the week, a third the minutes and seconds, and the fourth the hour of the day.

Above the dial-plates a gallery extends about half way around the clock, and in the center of this gallery is a carved wooden figure of our Savior, while at each end is a small door opening into the body of the clock. Over the right door is an eagle, and over the left a chicken-cock; and twice a day—that is, at noon and midnight—a chime of bells plays sweetly, during which the small door at the right opens, and twelve wooden figures, representing the twelve apostles, appear in procession, with Peter at the head. They walk slowly along the gallery, and each in turn, as he comes opposite the figure of the Master, bows with face toward him, and then, resuming his former position, passes onward till he reaches the door on the left, which they all enter. When Peter salutes the Lord, the cock crows; and when Judas, who is in the rear, with one hand shielding his face and the other grasping a bag, reaches the cock, it crows again.

At the extreme corners of the clock, placed conspicuously on pedestals, are beautifully carved statues of Moses and Elias; and in the rear are two obelisks of the Egyptian style, with hieroglyphic characters engraven thereon, designed to represent the ancient period of the world's history. The clock will run thirty-two hours, and by some separate arrangement the procession of the apostles can be repeated whenever desired.

Mr. Ketter, the maker of this wonderful clock, is a native of Frieburg, in Baden; has had no instruction or previous practice in clock-making, nor indeed in any branch of mechanics. He says, having often heard of the great clock in Strasbourg, Germany, he was anxious to visit it; but, being unable to do so, he set to thinking about it, and resolved to make one of his own, though he could form no idea whatever of the plan on which the Strasbourg clock was constructed.

SOMETHING STRANGER STILL.

But the very strangest thing we ever heard of in the way of a timepiece, was a clock described by a Hindoo rajah as belonging to a native prince, and jealously guarded as one of the rarest treasures of his luxurious palace. In front of the clock's disk was a gong swung upon poles, and near it was a pile of artificial human limbs. The pile was made up of the full number of parts necessary to constitute twelve perfect bodies; but all lay heaped together in apparent confusion.

When the hands of the clock indicated the hour of one, out from the pile crawled just the number of parts needed to form the frame of one man, part coming to part, with quick mechanic click; and when completed the figure sprang up, seized a mallet, and, walking up to the gong, struck one blow that sent the sound pealing through every corridor and room in that stately palace. This done, he returned to the pile and fell to pieces again. When two o'clock came two men arose, and did likewise; and at the hours of noon and midnight the entire heap sprang up, and, marching to the gong, struck one after the other his blow, making twelve in all, and then, returning, fell to pieces as before.

Can you imagine any piece of mechanism more wonderful?

At the Crystal Palace the automaton chess-player was on exhibition in a small room set apart for the purpose. It is said to have been invented in Austria, nearly a century ago; but it is just as interesting to us as though our grandfathers had never looked on and wondered at its quaint, curious operations. The chess-player represents a dark-visaged Turk, with long black beard, and loose robes and turbaned head. He sits on a round box two and a half feet high, covered with a thick cushion, and the chess-board lies before him over one leg. He plays with his right hand, moves the men quickly, and all his motions are not only graceful, but seem to indicate intelligence. Of course some one controls the movements of the automaton, as he plays with different people, sometimes winning and sometimes losing; but in what manner he is thus controlled no one has been able to ascertain. The box on which the figure sits contains only a quantity of wires; there is not space for a human being, even a very small one, to be accommodated therein, nor is there any apparent connection with machinery elsewhere.—Little Corporal.

Use of Spectacles.

When you find that you are beginning instinctively to go to the window or the open door when you take up a paper or a book to read, it is time for you to purchase a pair of spectacles; then get those of the lowest magnifying power, for if they magnify too much the eyes will get prematurely old—will fail rapidly. If, while reading, you find an inclination to stop and wink the eyes, as if to clear them, you need spectacles; or, if you have them already, you require older ones. A good way to rest the eyes from reading or fine sewing is either to close them for a few minutes, or look at something a long distance off; this gives great relief.

Do not purchase glasses on the street, or at cheap places, for there is great danger that the glasses are not alike—have not exactly the same focus, or are made of soft glass, which is easily scratched, and then older ones are soon required. The value of Brazilian pebbles, which is a natural glass, is their greater hardness; hence not easily injured, last a great while, and the eyes get old very slowly. But if the glasses are soft, are mismated, having unequal focal points, the eyes are strained and get old in a short time, especially if both foci are not in the center of the glass. In selecting glasses choose those which enable you to see well without a strain, for habitual straining of the eye ages it rapidly; at the same time avoid getting those of a stronger power than is needed.

Glasses should be washed with cold or warm water at least every morning, and should be wiped several times during the day with the buckskin, and nothing else; paper scratches them, and so does flannel, and a handkerchief is seldom clean enough for the purpose.

As the eye is the most delicate organ of the body, it should be treated with great care, and economy in spectacles is a great, a life-long misfortune. The eyes should not face a light; it is better to have the book in such a position as to have the light come on the page over the shoulder.

In reading by artificial light the eyelids should be shaded in such a way that the full glare does not fall on them, but on the paper or book, and cease using them as soon as they begin to feel tired.—Hall's Journal of Health.

BLESSED ARE THE DEAD.—Dr. Cumming, in a recently published scheme, mentioning the passage of Scripture, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord," relates the following striking anecdote:

A Roman Catholic lady I was the means of bringing out of that church told me that the words repeated by me, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, that they may rest," kindled in her heart convictions which she could not allay, and which on application to the priest he could not hush. She told me that she was once supposed to be on the point of death. "I was given up as dying," she said, "and a priest was sent for, a venerable man, to administer extreme unction. He did so; I had full possession of my mind, and I asked him: 'Now tell me, my father, am I saved?' And he answered: 'I can pledge my own salvation that you will be ultimately safe.' 'Ultimately; what does it mean?' 'My child, you must pass through purgatory.' I said; 'I have had extreme unction administered. * * * What is the nature of that purgatory through which I have to pass?' 'My child, purgatory is a place where you must endure the torments of the damned, only of shorter duration.'" Such was the comfort with which she was left to die; but this text seemed to her to annihilate purgatory.

MEN never believe others can do what they cannot do themselves.

A ROBBER.

BY CARL SPENCER.

April brought the twigs and leaves,
May has dined them like her bread;
In and out she flits and weaves,
Till the round green earth's a nest.
"Perfect!" says the smiling sun;
"Now your leisure is begun."

Summer pipes instead of spring—
There's a cuckoo in the nest;
Fie! the bonny, saucy thing!
High-ho, robin! dispossessed
Of the pretty nest you planned—
Fly and seek a safer land!

Chameleons.

There is a curious little lizard, the name of which is so coupled with fable that many believe it has never even existed. We mean the chameleon, which, though never seen on this continent, abounds in the old world. It is generally imagined that the reptile is capable of changing its color at will to the brightest of rainbow hues, and there is a widespread popular belief that it lives on air, both of which ideas, though naturally arising from the peculiar appearance and habits of the animal, are far from the truth. The chameleon measures from five to six inches in length, and has a curious pyramidal-shaped head, apparently separated from the neck. Its body is short and thick, and ends in a prehensile tail of medium length. The ears are concealed under the skin, the mouth is large, and the eyes, which are very prominent and full, are closely covered by a circular lid in which is a small round perforation just in front of the pupil. The legs are long and slender, and terminate in a hand formed of five toes, divided into two small bundles, so as to resemble one broad finger and a thumb. By the aid of these members, and by winding their tails around the branches, the lizards climb about shrubs and trees in search of insects. Their motions are, however, very slow, and their habits sluggish in the extreme. They will cling to bars of their cages for days at a time, giving not the slightest sign of life, except perhaps the occasional twinkle of one eye. Handling them does not seem to disturb their equanimity, as they rarely struggle as long as they are permitted to cling to a finger, while they are perfectly harmless.

The strange peculiarity of the animal, however, is its faculty of changing its color, not in bright tints, but from a pale gray to light green, yellow, brown, reddish and violet shades, all, however, dusky and undecided. These changes sometimes occur very rapidly, and are apparently provoked by anger and fear. In handling the lizard we have noticed that, although it would, as we have already intimated, show no symptom of uneasiness, the clear light tint which covered its whole body would give place to dark-brown blotches, some of which shaded curiously into black, resembling in form the spots of a leopard.

Another curious feature of the chameleon is the independence of its eyes. It moves them separately; and when the animal sleeps it seems as if but one-half of it were awakened at a time. If a light be placed before one eye, the half of the corresponding side of the body becomes of a different color from the other side; but the tint becomes uniform all over when the light is carried before the other organ. It would seem from this that the reptile has two distinct luminous perceptions.

So sluggish a creature, it might be supposed, would be hardly suited for catching insects, and such indeed would be the case were chasing the latter the only way of entrapping them. The chameleon, however, resorts to strategy, and grabs its prey from a distance over which the unsuspecting fly or bug hardly deems it possible that its enemy can reach. The lizard's mode of seizing the insect is not only peculiar, but also gives further proof of the dull nature of its perception. It never uses but one eye, and, while its body is perfectly motionless, will follow the movements of its prey with intense attention until it comes within about three inches of its nose; and then a tongue will dart out, more like a streak of pink lightning than anything else, strike the insect, and carry it back into the mouth. This tongue, which is out of all proportion to the size of the animal (sometimes twice its entire length,) is a hollow tube terminated by a fleshy knob which has a cup-like cavity on its anterior surface, always covered with a viscid fluid. It shoots out a perfectly straight rod, and strikes the insect with unerring accuracy.—Scientific American.

THE STAGE-HORSE "KITTY."—The following is one of Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's spirited little picture-sketches from life during one of his stage-coach journeys: "May I never forget the spirited little jade, the off-leader in the third stage, the petted belle of the route, the nervous, coquettish, mincing mare of Marshy Hope. A spoiled beauty she was; you could see that as she took the road with dancing step, tossing her pretty head about, and conscious of her shining black coat, and her tail done up 'in any simple knot,' like the back hair of Shelley's Beatrice Cenci. How she ambled and sidled, and plumed herself, and now and then let fly her little heels high in air, in mere excess of larkish feeling. 'So, girl! so Kitty!' murmurs the driver in the softest tones of admiration. 'She don't mean anything by it; she's just like a kitten.' But the heels kept flying above the traces, and by and by the driver is obliged to 'speak harsh' to the beauty. The reproof of the displeased tone is evidently felt, for she settles at once to her work, showing perhaps a little impatience, jerking her head up and down, and protesting by her nimble movements against the more deliberate trot of her companion. I believe that a blow from the cruel lash would have broken her heart, or else it would have made a little fiend of the spirited creature. The lash is hardly ever good for the sex."—Atlantic Monthly.

THE proof that we believe in the reality of religion is that we walk in the power of it.

Religious Intelligence.

THE Moravians have recently established a new station at Rama, in the northern part of Labrador.

THE New Brunswick Synod of the Church of England has voted to unite with the Provincial Synod of Canada.

A QUESTION is to come before the General Assembly of Scotland, whether a brewer can consistently be appointed an elder.

THE increase in the Pittsburg Conference the past year was, of probationers, 4,036; full members, 3,104; making a total of 7,140.

THERE are now in New York city forty-five Catholic churches, besides twenty-four chapels, with regular service in the different religious and charitable institutions.

THE English Wesleyan returns for 1874 show a membership in society of 351,686, an increase of 3,106 for the year. The Watchman says this "is matter for thankfulness."

DURING the last thirty years the sum of £1,069,282 has been expended on endowments, buildings, restorations and schools connected with the Church of England in the diocese of Peterborough.

THE number of pilgrims who visited Mecca this year is said to have been 160,000, and, owing to the precautions adopted by the Egyptian government, their health has been unusually good.

THE American Episcopal church in Rome appeals for aid to complete its beautiful edifice. Mr. Nevin, the rector, is now in New York, and the leading Episcopal clergymen and others have taken hold of the matter with commendable zeal, and the $18,000 necessary will, we trust, be speedily raised. The English Episcopalians are also completing a house within the walls. The Scotch and American Presbyterians are negotiating for a united church.

INDIAN MISSIONS.—The California Christian Advocate says there are eleven reservations on the Pacific coast, embracing more than twenty thousand Indians. Only two missions are reported to the Indian department among them, and both of these are in Washington Territory. There are three reservations in California. The Indian mission church at Round Valley is the largest Methodist church in California, probably the largest on the coast, having a membership of eight hundred and twenty-seven Indians, and more than twenty white members.

HINDOSTAN.—In the interior of Malabar and Travancore, in the southwestern part of Hindoostan, are a large number of Syrian Christians. They have some sixty churches, with some sixty thousand adherents. They have preserved the Syriac Scriptures in manuscript, and claim that the gospel was preached there by St. Thomas, where he died. They were certainly established there as early as the second century, and for ages have stood firm against wickedness, idolatry and persecution. But they have fallen greatly from their former state, and have become corrupt. Recently a most wonderful work of God has progressed among them—a revival of great power, characterized by powerful awakenings, hearty confession of sins, both by the priests and people, and a thorough reformation of life. The Holy Spirit is working mightily among them.—Zion's Herald.

"CIVILIZED HEATHEN."—A correspondent of the Madras Athenæum describes a recent procession he witnessed in Salem, Madras Presidency. "I observed," he says, "some devotees had their tongues pierced with iron rods; some had pins stuck all over their bodies, and garlands hanging from them; some had made incisions in their sides, in which were inserted iron rods; some passed through these incisions large ropes, held on both sides by two persons, and some employed four men to carry a small car, the middle of whose axles passed through their sides." Those who listened to Mr. Murray's lecture on "Civilized Heathen" will note that this is a specimen of humane, enlightened Buddhism. Further, the Friend of India says that "Buddhism defies sin;" and intelligence has just come to hand that all the inhabitants of Taifoo, in southwestern China, amounting to about fifty thousand, were massacred, men, women and children, not one left, by the Buddhists.

ORGANIZATIONS IN THE SOUTH.—Rev. Dr. Strieby makes the following statement in the Christian Mirror: "I find I was inaccurate in the statement made at the meeting of the Maine Conference that there were eight organized Congregational bodies in the South. In eight of the Southern States there are churches, under the care of the American Missionary Association mainly, that might unite in this way, but as yet only four such organizations have been formed, namely, the Southwestern Conference, embracing nine churches in Tennessee, four in western Georgia, five in Alabama and two in Mississippi; the Congregational Conference of Texas, with three churches in that State; and the Association of Christian Churches and Ministers of Kentucky, embracing five churches. Besides these the association has planted and nourishes one church in Virginia. An organization has been in contemplation for the contiguous churches in North Carolina, South Carolina and eastern Georgia, and others will follow as rapidly as may be deemed best.

ADVANCE OF PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.—Tidings continue to be received of the progress of Protestantism. Even the political papers are noticing that in Lyons the Roman Catholic population are sending their children to the Protestant schools until they overflow, and new schools conducted by Protestants are being opened. Interesting ordinations of pastors in various towns, and opening of meetings and places of worship are to be noted. The fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of the Protestant temple at Anduze drew above three thousand Protestants to a joyful religious festival. The town of Epinal, by the influx of Alsacians, needed a new church, which was opened lately just as the Prussian troops had left, and the town was en fete. The prefect and other authorities were present, and Pastor Schmidt, the venerable president of the Consistory, who, forty years ago, commenced the Protestant worship in Epinal with twenty hearers, had the joy of placing the Bible in the handsome new building which he dedicated to the worship of God. An ordination took place on the same occasion. At Evreux Pastor Rolland preaches the gospel in the amphitheater, placed by the authorities at his disposal.

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS IN BEYROOT. The city of Beyroot, situated on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean sea, contains a population of about one hundred thousand persons, of various religions, including Mohammedans, Greek Church, Roman Catholics, Jews, Protestants, Druses, etc. Thirty years ago there were only two women who could read; now there are twelve Protestant girls' schools, and a considerable number of boys' schools. In the day schools there are more than one thousand girls studying the same Bible which we have, and singing our beautiful and evangelical hymns. A Christian Protestant association has been formed, and is now at work with much vigor and excellent results. At a recent meeting in London the president of that association, Manlius Salim Kesser, gave the following account of its origin and labor: "Three years ago a few young men were gathered together playing cards and smoking in the house of one whose sister was in one of the schools. The entertainer took from one of the shelves a Bible brought home by his sister, and began to read it. He was very much surprised and interested by it, and called the attention of his friends to it. He read some parts of it, and it made such an impression upon their hearts that they gave up their play and agreed together to devote their meetings to reading the Scriptures and conversing upon religious subjects. (Applause.) They asked the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and wrote out rules and regulations for their society; though they belonged to different churches, they agreed to have the Bible and prayer as the foundation of the association, and not to accept any member who would not agree to their principles. They experienced opposition from their parents, and some were discarded by them, but they remained faithful. An English lady who was at the head of the school was interested in the matter, and offered them a room in her house for their meetings, and they had now met in it for three years. But lately the number of members being increased, and the spirit of inquiry being revived, they had said: 'We must not confine ourselves to meetings for prayer and conversation, but must do something for Christ; let us organize and divide the work.' Thus the work was divided; it was arranged that some of them should teach in night schools, others visit the sick, others issue sermons and little tracts for the public. Many of the members had become communicants of the Protestant Church, and most of them are engaged in Sunday schools."

ALL STOCKHOLDERS in the missionary vessel, Morning Star, says the Congregationalist, will be deeply interested in the following fragments of a "log," furnished by Rev. Dr. Damon, of the Sandwich Islands: "She sailed from Honolulu on the ninth of June, 1873, and returned on the fifteenth of May, having been absent over eleven months. When she sailed serious fears were entertained respecting her return, for her cruise would be partially among low coral islands not previously explored, and inhabited by Polynesians who had never seen a Christian missionary. It was my privilege in 1861 to visit all these islands of Micronesia, going as a delegate and passenger on board the first Morning Star; hence I can testify to the joy and rejoicing which accompanies the arrival and departure of this messenger vessel from the children of America to the missionaries of Micronesia. Her arrival is looked forward to as the great event of the whole year; and when, through the influence of calms or headwinds, she is delayed beyond her usual time, then the most anxious suspense is experienced by the lonely missionaries, and all possible conjectures are resorted to to account for her delay. Such was the fact, during her late cruise, for she did not reach the Marshall Islands until after Messrs. Snow and Whitney had almost become wearied out with looking through their telescopes. She was two months behind time. The mission families had become reduced to short rations! Under such circumstances your readers can imagine the heartfelt joy that would attend her appearance.' After referring to the further explorations of the vessel among several groups of hitherto unvisited islands, lying to the west of Ponape, Dr. Damon continues: "This has been the largest, and, I may add, one of the most important cruises which the Morning Star has ever made. I cannot well conceive how she could have been more successful and prosperous. She has fully answered the great object for which she was launched and fitted out. Most heartily would I congratulate the children and others in America who have contributed for the building and running these three Morning Stars! Repeatedly have I seen them arrive and depart from the harbor of Honolulu. I have been intimately acquainted with all who have sailed in them as missionaries and seamen, and it affords me great joy and satisfaction to assure the friends and patrons of missions in America that their ships have proved a success.

'Charged with a freight transcending in its worth
The gems of India, nature's earnest birth,' these vessels have made nearly or quite twenty voyages to the Micronesian and Marquesan Islands. The good news of gospel truth has thereby been conveyed to well-nigh fifty islands; which would not otherwise have been made acquainted with the knowledge of Jesus Christ as a Savior of sinners. Surely no one will regret what he may have done to promote this goodly enterprise!"

The Seashore Camp Meeting.

This meeting began, according to programme, and under glowing auspices, with the first religious service on Friday night, the twenty-fourth ultimo. The holders and occupants of the forty tents we found on the ground had beeu arriving for several days previous, so that when they all poured out to worship the congregation numbered perhaps one hundred and fifty persons or more. The meeting fell, as usual, under the charge of the editor of this paper, who also preached the sermon on Friday night from Second Corinthians vi, 2: "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation;" and struck the key-note of the subsequent services in his theme—"a present salvation." The usual order of services was announced, comprising four sermons a day, and prayer and experience meetings always in order. Bishop Marvin had arrived at noon on Friday, and at the same time a strong force of preachers from various directions. Rev. James A. Ivy gave us the lessons of the Transfiguration at eleven o'clock on Saturday morning; Rush, of Mobile, gave new inspiration to our faith by his discourse in the afternoon, on Psalms cxxv, 1; and at night Bishop Marvin sounded the note of alarm from Romans vi, 23: "The wages of sin is death." We do not propose to follow further the sermons specifically, except that we cannot fail to notice the invaluable services of Bishop Marvin, who preached for us once each day for the five days together of his stay, and each time with accumulated power, as by the abiding and gathering momentum of the Holy Spirit within him, and only failed of a perfect climax because eternity will be too short to utter all the sublimities and hopes of the truth, "as the truth is in Jesus." We seek to furnish in this notice of the Bishop some expression—without which the preachers and people present at the camp meeting would not be satisfied with this article—of the pleasure and comfort we had in his presence and labors.

From the first the spirit of devotion and faith evidently prevailed in the church, and under the awakening power of God perhaps thirty persons presented themselves for prayers on the first Sunday night. It was very noticeable that at each service at the stand, from day to day, all the persons on the ground, with few exceptions, were uniformly collected. There was little lingering in the tents, in the promenading on the beach at the times of worship. At each successive blowing of the horn, after brief intermissions, the people were ready for another sermon and the subsequent exercises. These facts were tokens of a deep interest in spiritual things as the main concern of the occasion; and as we met acquaintances and strangers, from time to time, we were impressed by their spontaneous confession, which indicated that the meeting was of universal blessing and profit. We shall not venture an estimate of the number of conversions, since at this writing the meeting is not yet concluded; but we anticipate the report of a large number, perhaps approximating one hundred.

There were many interesting cases of God's power to witness peace to the human heart. We mention one—that of a man addicted to the waters, and who confessed, in a public experience meeting, his addiction also to the vices of the sailor. He had been a sinner for fifty years; had two years since undertaken the vows of church membership, through deep conviction of his duty, but had not found the peace he felt he ought to have, and had brought his insupportable burden to the camp meeting. He was surprised, at the time spoken of, to find himself on his feet in an experience meeting, testifying to a marvelous change, a comfort and rest of spirit, which were to him then the greatest and deepest of all the realities of his life. At private prayer he had heard, as it were, a voice saying, "All is well with thee," and immediately afterward, by the space of a minute and a half, as he accurately and simply recognized the time, a reassuring word, saying: "Doubt no more." He was among the happiest men we ever saw.

After Sunday we were reinforced by ministers arriving whom we had not seen at the Seashore camp meeting before—Dr. Jefferson Hamilton, of Mobile, Drs. A. S. and M. S. Andrews, of Greensboro, H. F. Johnson, of Brookhaven, and others, whose gospel came not to us in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. Late on Thursday evening we had the pleasure of greeting also Bishop McTyeire, whose coming was opportune and providential for the remaining days of the meeting. We have heard of his preaching, since we left the ground, in wonderful adaptation to the precise needs of the hour; and we have heard also of the remarkable meeting which followed the sermon of Bishop Keener on Friday night. No doubt the meeting was in the Bishop first, and most powerfully stirred within him when, at a late hour that night, God converted and wondrously blessed, as we learn, his son John.

The enterprise and labors of the trustees were everywhere apparent in vast improvements for convenience and accommodation which they had devised and successfully executed. The new and shorter road from the railroad to the camp was a great convenience, and ample accommodations were furnished, for all who desired to tent on the ground, in well-built and substantial structures, while lodging and bed were provided for transient visitors with the accuracy and dispatch of a first-class hotel. We ought perhaps to mention a novelty to us in the two-storied tent erected by Bro. Otis, of Mobile, in which he claimed that he could lodge seventy persons. At any rate, a large number of friends and visitors were freely entertained with food and lodging by his hospitality.

We take advantage of the editor's peremptory remission of these columns to our occupancy to acknowledge our indebtedness to Bro. S. K. Russ, of New Orleans, for first-class quarters, bedstead, mattress and furniture, almost beyond the legitimate luxury of a camp meeting. We feared that we should miss at this meeting our old friend and brother J. L. Dunnica, lately removed from New Orleans, who had taken care of us in superb style the two years previous;

"But when such suggestions our graces have tried,
This answers all questions: The Lord will provide."

Oregon Correspondence.

MR. EDITOR: Oregon offers peculiar inducements to oppressed, tax-burdened, disheartened Southerners. Here is room and a hearty welcome for thousands from thousands. I mean not to disguise the fact that there are people here who would give a more hearty welcome to Easterners or Westerners than Southerners. Still, no man is ostracised. Political corruption would seem great here if we credit the accusations of each party against the other. A very animated and exciting election has just passed. The canvass was warm. Nearly the entire Democratic State ticket was elected—one exception only. There were three tickets in the field. Human nature is the same the world over—the lust and greed for power and gain the same. But here we have little or nothing of the inevitable negro, whose suffrages are the "bone of contention." Socially, this fact is comfortable. There is no conflict of races; it is more a conflict of waning prejudices.

Churchly, we are moving on as best we can. There are "many adversaries." The most specious forms of infidelity and skepticism are prevalent. "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation." A pure gospel, preached in love and earnestness, is the most successful method of meeting it.

The antagonism of the two Methodisms is unfortunate and to be deplored, and to me presents the most unpleasant feature of this work. I can understand the merits of the question. The world demands an explanation. This pressure is great and hard to satisfy. Our co-religionists regard us as interlopers. There are a great many people who are unwilling to receive the gospel from any other. We are trying to preach a pure gospel, unmixed with politics, cant, or any other of the prevalent fanaticisms. Ours is a gospel of peace and love, and it will obtain and win trophies for the coronet of Jesus. We earnestly "follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man can see the Lord."

We need and must have a few more faithful laborers in this harvest-field. Loving, ardent, single-eyed men need not fear getting a support, if they can only get here.

The Missionary Board has made an appropriation for us. That, with what we can get from the people, will give our preachers a support above pinching want. Who wants more? "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content, for he hath said, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.'" Blessed promise! Faith lays hold to it, and rests as upon a rock. O glorious rest of faith! We thank the board for this help proposed. We shall try to be faithful to our trust, and hope after awhile not only to be able to sustain ourselves, but help others. Let the people pray for us.

If any of the people or preachers are looking in this direction, and if any statements made in my communications are operating in that way, I hope they will come by the first of October, or wait till May or June. Don't come late in the fall, as I did.

I hope many of my personal friends will consider themselves as addressed in these letters, as I have not time to write to many to whom I desire.

I would like so much to meet with the brethren at the Seashore camp meeting this year. God has been with us there. We have realized: "Behold, how good and pleasant it is to dwell together in unity." O that "Our souls would ever stay

In such a frame as this."

May you have a blessed time. I shall be with you in spirit.

My family are well, and well pleased with Oregon. My own health is improving. It is not long till our Conference. I have much to do, in the meantime, by God's grace and help. Will welcome Bishop Pierce to our coast, and hope he may bring along from three to six good recruits for our little band.

God bless you and the brethren in your labors to sustain and build up the cause of our blessed Redeemer! Amen.

Affectionately, T. B. WHITE.

Diana of the Ephesians.

Mr. J. T. Wood writes from Asia Minor to the London Atheneum that the excavations at Ephesus are abandoned for the present. The Temple of Diana, the platform upon which it is raised and the ground about for a distance of thirty feet, have been explored. Mr. Wood says:

"On my return from England last October to direct this work, I continued to clear out the sand and debris from such portions of the site of the Temple of Diana as had not been already explored, as well as a considerable area in every direction beyond the lowest step of the temple platform, Pliny's 'universum Templum.' Fearing that the rainy season would set in earlier than usual, and that the water, rising in the excavations, would prevent the exploration of the site to the required depth, I engaged three hundred workmen, who, under the sergeant and corporal of the Royal Engineers allotted me by government, as well as a Greek gauger and three Turkish canvassers, rapidly cleared the ground to be explored. Happily my fears were not realized, and, instead of an unusually early wet season, it was exceptionally dry, and I was therefore able to explore the whole site two feet lower than in former seasons.

"More than one hundred feet of the lowest step of the temple platform was found in position on the north side and about ten feet on the east end. Over the step on the north side a large circular lime-kiln, fifteen feet in diameter, had been erected soon after the destruction of the temple, and into this, and several others found on the site, was doubtless thrown most of the beautiful sculpture which had so materially added to the magnificence of the structure which it adorned.

"The great altar, nineteen feet six inches square, discovered last season, has been fully laid bare. There is a drain in the foundation of it, which, I suppose, served to carry away the water used in washing the surface. The position of this altar gives the approximate position of the statue of the goddess, as well as that of the columns which decorated the interior of the cella in two tiers. The dry season enabled me thoroughly to explore the whole cella. In so doing I discovered remains of three distinct temples—the last but two, the last but one, and the last. The former must have been built 500 B. C., for which the solid foundations described by Pliny and Vitruvius were laid. A portion of the west and south walls of this temple, with some of the pavement, was found remaining in position, as well as a great quantity of the pavement under the peristyle of the last temple. This pavement consists of two layers, one of white marble and the other of limestone, and is the same as that which was found the last day of the year 1869, marking the site of the temple.

"Between five and six feet below the pavement, and under the foundations of the walls of the cella, I found the layer of charcoal, four inches thick, described by Pliny; this was laid between two layers of a composition about three inches thick, similar to and of the consistency of glazier's putty. Could this have been the fleeces of wool on which the temple was said to have been built? The lower stones of the ante of this early temple were also found in position, as well as those of the bases of one or two columns. Between the ante were found five of the mortices which were cut in the pavement to receive the standards of an iron grille, which separated the pronaos from the peristyle. We found remains of the pavement of the last temple but one—the one commenced in the early part of the fourth century B. C., and burnt by Herostratus in the year 356 B. C.

"The pavement had been highly polished, and was raised nearly four feet higher than that of the preceding temple. In conjunction with it were found two of the stones immediately connected with the door, in one of which was cut the mortice-hole to receive the door-post, and the groove upon which the door was moved; in the other stone was cut the wide and deep groove for the outer wheel. These blocks had been raised upon a strong foundation of limestone. The door-way must have been nearly fifteen feet wide. The pavement of the last temple was raised still higher, that of its peristyle being as much as seven feet six inches above the pavement of the cella of the last but two.

"On removing the ground beyond the temple platform a portico was discovered at a distance of twenty feet beyond the lowest step, which apparently ran around three sides of the area."

Dr. Tyng's Call to the Ministry.

I awoke in the early morning of the nineteenth of July, 1819, with a voice that seemed to sound in my ear with the solemn appeal: "What a wasteful life you are leading." I answered in my silent conscience and heart: "I will live so no longer." I immediately arose from my bed, and without dressing knelt upon the floor and gave myself, in my poor way, to a Lord whom I did not know, but by whose voice I fully believed I was called. I went down, as usual, to my business, but my whole mind and purposes and plans were changed. The world of wealth had passed out of my view, a load of sin pressed upon my heart, but I knew no outward instructor who could comprehend my wants or guide my way. Thus I groped for days without one earthly comforter.

Nearly opposite the head of the street in which we are assembled, adjoining the Tremont House, you may see a small quadrant spot of grass inclosed. It is all that remains of a large and beautiful yard, in which was then the residence of Mr. Adam Babcock, one of the leading men of Boston in that day. The whole residue of the property has been incorporated in the site of the hotel. In that court-yard dwelt a retired nurse, long in the family, in rooms prepared for her. She was a venerated Christian woman, who was familiarly called, by all the branches of the family, Aunt Minot. Some of my young female connections told her the strange news that "Stephen Tyng was out of his head in thinking and talking about religion." The old lady sent a message desiring to see me. She was a Methodist. The family, like myself, had always been in the congregation of the Trinity church. Her Christian home was "Bromfield Lane Methodist chapel." That lady was the first Christian friend I found who knew a Savior's love, understood a Savior's gospel, and could enter into my heart, having received this gospel neither by man nor from man. With her I could talk of Jesus and not be deemed insane.

A single month passed before, under the pressure and guidance of that Spirit by whom I had been called, I left all the business of earth, and gave myself simply and wholly to my Savior's work. I was considered insane by many in a world which looked only to its own things. I have no doubt that many of my friends really lamented over me as insane. But whether I was beside myself it was to God. I gave up all the prospect of wealth before me, and determined to preach my Savior's gospel. My dear father, with whom I lived, replied to my proposal of this change: "Are you crazy? You are throwing away the most brilliant prospects of any young man in Boston." I answered: "I was never more sane in my life, sir. I cannot help it. I know that I am called to preach the gospel. I know that there is some place between here and the Rocky mountains for me to preach my Savior's love. I am going until I find it." The venerated man was overwhelmed. "Well," said he, "you will spoil a first-rate merchant to make a very poor parson." "It may be so, sir, but I must go." He was spared to me for ten years after that interview, to value most highly my poor attempts, to encourage with the utmost affection my efforts in the Savior's cause, and gain a part of his consolation in death from my grateful ministry. This was "my manner of entering in."—Dr. Tyng's Lecture before the Boston University.

"WHILE in Jerusalem," writes a lady traveler, "we paid our respects to the Princess de la Tour d'Auvergne, who resides there, and who has purchased the Mount of Olives from the Catholics for $100,000, ceding it to the French government. For seven centuries it was lost to the Catholics—ever since the Crusaders were driven out of Jerusalem. She is now erecting a convent on the very spot where Christ prayed. The prayer is inscribed in thirty-two languages around the inclosure of the court-yard."

Dying Words.

The most interesting last words are those which we can believe to express the most intimate sentiment of a man passing consciously into eternity. Considered as a species of literary composition, they should be a kind of anticipatory epitaph; they should be sufficiently characteristic to express the idiosyncrasy of the speaker, and at the same time should express some pathetic sentiment common to all mankind; for, at the last solemn moment, the petty interests of the individual should disappear. Pope speaks of dying words as exhibiting the "ruling passion strong in death;" and the phrase which he gives to Cobham, "Oh, save my country, Heaven!" is an excellent example of what a dying speech ought to be. The authenticity of the very similar words attributed to Pitt has been disputed, though it seems that he really said something of the kind. The only criticism which occurs to one is whether even patriotism is not too narrow a passion to occupy the mind in the presence of death. Death should elevate us above ties to any special country. We incline to prefer, therefore, the dying words of Nelson: "Thank God, I have done my duty." They are thoroughly characteristic; and though the duty which Nelson had accomplished involved the destruction of a large number of his fellow-creatures, yet the general sense of accomplished duty is undoubtedly among the noblest of consolations.

Let us expose to a similar test a few of the earlier dying words. Martin, of Tours, said to the devil as he was dying: "Thou hast no part in me; I go to Abraham's bosom." Joy at escaping the devil is, after all, rather a selfish sentiment. Bede expired while repeating the doxology. To turn to pagan philosophers, Marcus Aurelius said to the centurion of the watch: "Turn to the rising sun, for I am setting." Here we may feel that the touch of sarcasm which mingles with the melancholy is a little out of place. A nobler sentiment is attributed to Antonius Pius, who gave to the tribune asking for the watchword the last word: "Æquanimitas." If authentic, this is one of the noblest of dying words, being at once highly characteristic and conveying the best teaching of philosophical morality. The chief objection that can be made to it is that it savors a little of a lesson learnt by rote. This fault is a very fatal one, for we naturally lose all interest in a dying speech when we feel that it is merely an attempt to catch at an accustomed formula, and therefore betrays less the genuine feeling of the man than an instinctive disposition to do what is expected of him. The last words attributed to Michael Angelo, "In passage through your life remember the sufferings of Jesus Christ," are really impressive, because we can believe that such a thought occurred to a religious mind with unusual force at the last solemn moment.

Cranmer repeated the dying words of St. Stephen: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." "I die like a good Catholic," said Philip the Second, "in faith and obedience to the holy Roman Church." Hooker's last words are to us a more impressive embodiment of a similar thought: "I could wish to live to do the church more service, but cannot hope it, for my days are past as a shadow that returns not." Here we feel another slight qualm; the sentence is a little too elaborate for a dying man. Last words should be epigrammatic without being flippant. We are perhaps more moved, therefore, by the utterance of DeQuadra, dying at a time when his long labors seemed to have a chance of fulfillment: "No puedo mas"—"I can do no more." There, though the sentiment is exceedingly simple, we feel the pathos of a strong man breaking down, but struggling to the last; and, whatever be the objects to which he devotes himself, there is always something impressive in such a spectacle.

Coming to sufferers of a different class, we have a model of the way in which the dying ought not to speak in the last words of the grandmother of Frederick the Great: "I am now going to satisfy my curiosity about matters which Leibnitz has never been able to explain to me—about Space, the Infinite Being and Nothing; and for the King, my consort, I prepare a funeral pageant which will afford him a new occasion for the display of his magnificence." One hopes that the poor lady was wandering; but there is something characteristic of the period in this view of the next world, as a region where we should be able to solve problems just too hard for Leibnitz, and where, at the same time, the pomps and vanities of the Prussian court would still be worthy objects of consideration. The last words of Frederick himself belong to a different class. They are simply trifling, and become pathetic only by force of contrast. He told his attendants to throw a quilt over one of his dogs who was shivering on a stool. Somewhat resembling this are Chesterfield's often-quoted words: "Give Dayrolles a chair;" they are generally said to be characteristic, though in an unpleasant sense. They are, however, merely characteristic by accident, if we may say so; for any other man might have accidentally used such a phrase at his last moment, and we do not suppose that even in Chesterfield, a man of genuine ability, though a coxcomb and a profligate, the desire to be courteous was really a ruling passion. We put into the words more than they will fairly bear. A similar misgiving, though in a very different case, besets us about Goethe's celebrated "More light." We have here an odd coincidence, not a great man's conscious expression of his strongest emotions. Another celebrated dying speech is offensive because too conscious: Mirabeau's "Si ce n'est pas la Dieu, c'est du moins son cousin-germain" is a melancholy bit of false bombast at a solemn moment.

We are, after all, inclined to repeat how hard it is to die, at least to die gracefully and affectingly. Some touching phrases have been uttered by dying men, and some good ones have been invented for them; but it is seldom that we can quote any such expression with entire satisfaction. We are inclined to doubt whether the best remark upon the subject is not that made by Whitefield a short time before his death. One of his disciples—a charming creature he must have been—was anticipating from him "a special testimony for Christ which should be borne on his death-bed." Whitefield, we may guess, was a little disgusted by this anticipatory gloating over his dying emotions, and replied: "I shall die silent." He died as he had said, and we are glad that there was one less opportunity for an unctuous death-bed tract. When we think of death, and reflect upon the possibility of being surrounded by hungry biographers anxious for a pretty concluding paragraph, we are tempted to wish that more great men would follow Whitefield's example.—Jacox's Nightfall and Midnight.

One Day and a Thousand Years.

People who are very much dissatisfied with the slow progress of the gospel would do well to think a little of that profound remark of St. Peter's: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." God's movements, he teaches us, are either very slow or very fast. Sometimes he seems to take a thousand years to one day's work, and sometimes in one day he seems to do the work of a thousand years. Very slow sapping and mining, and then a great explosion; the water creeping up the syphon at the rate of a drop a day, the syphon at last getting filled, and then, in one hour, discharging a perfect flood. "Providence," says M. Guizot, "is like the gods of Homer—he moves a step, and ages have rolled away." What happened at the siege of Jericho was typical of what is always happening: twelve circuits of the walls performed without apparently an atom of result; at the end of the thirteenth the whole fortifications leveled with the ground. If we think of the advent of the Savior, there were four thousand years of unfulfilled promise and weary waiting; at last the angel's message announced the glorious advent. How long did good men toil to reform the church in the middle ages, and seemingly all in vain! At last a monk is seen hammering a paper on a church door at Wittemberg, and behold, a great reformation has come. How hopeless seemed the abolition of slavery in the Southern States—more hopeless than ever after Dred Scott decisions and all that followed on them. One day, in a military extremity, the President issues a proclamation, and American slavery is at an end. The progress of Christianity in the world has been slow enough for many a century, and slow enough during the sixty or seventy years of revived missionary effort in modern times; but there will come a day which shall do the work of a thousand years. We are always carried forward in Scripture to a grand consummation, in which the arm of the Lord shall be made bare in the sight of all the nations; but even before that great consummation there may be not a few harvest epochs in which marvelous results shall transpire with incredible swiftness. So it was a few years ago in Madagascar; so it has been in various districts of the mission-field. So far from having cause to despair, we have every reason to give thanks and take courage; not only would our faith be worthless, but our intelligence, our appreciation of God's methods, our capacity of reading divine lessons, would be shamefully at fault if we grumbled at whole generations of patient waiting and drudging effort, or dreamed of enjoying the triumphs of harvest without the labors of the spring, and the patient waiting of summer and autumn.—Sunday Magazine.

The Minister at the Death-Bed.

When the Rev. Dr. Binney, of India, was in this country he was one evening called out of the room to see a man who proved to be a perfect stranger. "I heard that a minister by the name of Binney was stopping at this house, sir, and I want you to go and see my wife, who is very ill. She has been trying all day to make me understand what she wanted, and at last I found it was a minister. Do come quickly, for she is very low, and will, I fear, soon be unconscious."

They started at once, and on the way the doctor ascertained that neither he nor his wife knew anything of religion. On reaching the place, the doctor said to the man: "You must sit down beside your wife, and I shall address all my conversation to you, as she is too ill to be spoken to, and you must reply to my questions." He promised to do so. Then the doctor, speaking slowly and distinctly, explained the way of salvation through Christ, and closed with an affectionate and earnest appeal to him to give his heart at once to the Savior. The man was deeply affected. His wife lay through it all, apparently unconscious; but he knelt and offered a fervent prayer for mercy for both, and left them.

Two or three months after he received a letter from the woman, who, to the surprise of all, had recovered. She told him that although unable to speak or move, she had heard every word he addressed to her husband, and then and there she gave herself to Christ. Her husband had been converted by means of the same conversation, and they had both united with the church.

Dr. Binney, in telling the story, said it had been a life long lesson to him to point the soul to Christ, even if apparently too far gone to listen, and to speak words of comfort to departing souls while life lasted.

SAID an eminent person whose gift of money-making seemed to his neighbors to quite outstrip his gifts of money: "True, I do not give much; but if you know how it hurt when I give any you would not wonder."

HE IS not only idle who does nothing, but he is idle who might be better employed.

About Some Hymns.

One of the most remarkable instances of youthful precocity on record is that related by the charming writer of "Evenings with the Sacred Poets," concerning the author of our beautiful hymn:

"Jesus and can it ever be,
A mortal man ashamed of thee?"

These lines were written by Thomas Green, of Ware, in the year 1774, when only ten years old. As Mr. Sammers says: "As a marvel of precocious talent, it deserves to rank with Milton's psalm, 'Let us with a gladsome mind,' written at the age of fifteen."

One of our most inspiriting hymns, which stirs the heart like the sound of the trumpet, is that commonly known as "Coronation." It is frequently found in our hymn-books credited to a Mr. Duncan, and sometimes to Rowland Hill, with whom it was a great favorite. Its real author, however, was the Rev. Edward Perronet, a dissenting clergyman in the time of the Wesleys. He was a traveling companion and kindred spirit with Charles Wesley, and it is pleasant to imagine them joyously singing and preaching their happy way through southern England.

A recent writer has given us the following anecdote in connection with this grand hymn: "The late William Dawson, a highly popular local preacher among the Wesleyan Methodists of England, was, some years since, preaching in London upon the offices of Christ. After presenting him as the great Teacher and Priest, who made himself an offering for sin, the preacher introduced him as the King of saints. Having shown him to be King in his own right, he marshaled the immense procession of patriarchs and kings, prophets and apostles, martyrs and confessors of every age and time, until at length all his followers were assembled, and the imposing ceremony of coronation was about to take place. The audience were intensely excited, and when Mr. Dawson began singing,

'All hail the power of Jesus' name,
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all,' the audience sprang to their feet and sung the hymn with such spirit and feeling as perhaps it was never sung before, right loyally paying their homage to Jesus as their sovereign." Perronet wrote several books of sacred poetry, but only one grand hymn, and "that was enough; that man did not live in vain who taught Christ's church her grandest coronation song in honor of her King." Perronet died in 1792, his last words being: "Glory to God in the height of his divinity, glory to God in the depth of his humanity, glory to God in his all-sufficiency, and unto his hands I commend my spirit."—Maria P. Woodbridge, in the Ladies' Repository.

Models of Prayer.

We have been interested in looking through the Scriptures for the purpose of comparing the prayers therein recorded with those which we hear from time to time in public, and we are astonished to see how they differ in point, expression, directness, and, above all, in length, from those heard in these days in the Christian pulpit. It is not exaggeration to say that we have listened to a single prayer longer than the whole ten that we find in the Bible put together. The first is in Genesis xxiv, 12-14, and contains one hundred and ten words, and it is not more than one minute in length. The next is Exodus xxxiii, 12-15, and contains one hundred and eleven words, and is not over a minute long. The third is in Joshua vii, 7-9, and contains ninety words. The fourth is in Second Kings xix, 15, 16, the prayer of Hezekiah; it is composed of one hundred and thirty-four words, and two minutes would be ample time to repeat it. Another is found in Nehemiah i, 5-11, and is about two minutes in length; another is in Ezra ix, 6-15, and is about three minutes long; another is in First Kings viii, 23-61, an important dedicatory prayer, offered by Solomon himself, at the dedication of the temple, and it did not occupy more than six minutes; while that of Daniel ix, 11-19 was probably four minutes long. In the New Testament the prayer of our Savior (John xvii) is well known; it is contained in twenty-six verses, and is five minutes long, while the model prayer—the Lord's Prayer—is far briefer still. Now here are ten prayers from those who certainly knew how to pray, and they are all less than thirty-five minutes long, or an average of three minutes each; and yet we sometimes hear men pray thirty and forty minutes, and, after wandering all over the moral universe, and wearying their fellow-worshipers with vain repetitions, utterly fail of the prime object of all public prayer—to lift up the hearts of men to commune with Heaven. It must be an extraordinary occasion, equal at least to the dedication of the Jewish temple at Jerusalem—an occasion that none of us shall ever see—to justify a prayer more than five minutes long. There are few "Oh's" and "Ah's" in these models. Their authors do not often say "O Lord, Lord," buttenderly, blindly, directly, quietly, simply they ask the blessing they desire, as though they were children who knew that they were addressing One who was more willing to give them good gifts than they were to ask them at his hand.—Gospel Banner.

To Do Good.—To do good to men is the great work of life; to make them true Christians is the greatest good we can do them. Every investigation brings us round to this point. Begin here, and you are like one who strikes water from a rock on the summits of the mountains; it flows down the intervening tracts to the very base. If we could make each man love his neighbor we should make a happy world. The true method is to begin with ourselves, and so to extend the circle to all around us. It should be perpetually in our minds.—I. W. Alexander.

Foreordination Illustrated.

The Boston Congregationalist publishes three versions of an interview which once took place between the Rev. Mr. Storrs, of Longmeadow, grandfather of the Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Brooklyn, and the Rev. Mr. Howard, of Springfield:

"Mr. Storrs having once made an appointment to exchange with the late Rev. Mr. Howard, of Springfield, started for the latter place with his own team, on the Sunday agreed upon, and when about half way thither met Mr. Howard driving down. Tissy stopped, naturally, for a moment's conversation, and Mr. Storrs soon glided into his favorite theme. 'Why,' said he, 'see how wonderful are the decrees of Providence. Here it has been foreordained from all eternity that we should exchange pulpits to-day, and sure we are met talking the matter over.' 'What's that?' said Mr. Howard, not quite sure on this foreordination business. 'Do you say that it has been decreed that we should exchange pulpits to-day?' 'I do,' replied the other solemnly. 'Well, then,' returned Mr. Howard, 'I'll break one of God's decrees, for I shall preach in my own pulpit to-day;' and, turning his horse about, he drove rapidly homeward, leaving the astonished Mr. Storrs to return to Longmeadow, musing on the possible uncertainty of decrees.

"Another version states that Mr. Howard exclaimed: 'Bro. Storrs, do you believe that God decreed from all eternity that I should go to Longmeadow and preach that lecture for you?' 'Surely I do,' said Bro. Storrs. 'Then I won't go,' said Mr. Howard, turning his horse slowly in the mud toward Springfield. 'If you do not go with us, then God did not decree that you would. Go, or not go, you will carry out God's decree,' said Bro. Storrs. Mr. Howard felt the force of the argument, and went on to preach the lecture.

"Another correspondent gives a different version still:

"The incident occurred as related up to the driving back to Springfield. At that point Mr. Storrs said: 'Don't make a fool of yourself! Don't you see if you do that, it was decreed that you should make a fool of yourself?' This settled Mr. Howard to go to Longmeadow and fulfill the appointment. Mr. Howard preached the truth of election, and was a firm believer in the doctrine. One of his deacons, after a strong sermon, coming out of church, said to him: 'Such preaching is not profitable.' Dr. O: 'Is it Scripture, Deacon B?' 'Why, yes; I suppose it is,' he replied. 'Then,' said the doctor, 'the apostle has settled the rest; he says all Scripture is profitable.'"

IMPERCEPTIBLE PRESENCE.—The moment we cross the threshold of a dwelling, we find the housewife represented by her mode of housekeeping. While we sit in the parlor waiting the presence of the mistress, we study the outlines of her character even in this limited portion of her dominion.

Not alone in the parlor can we estimate justly her inferior or superior talent for home thriftiness. Kitchen and pantry, closet and cupboard alike manifest her aptness or incapacity for the position of mistress. Above all, we quickly note the individuality of a person by an independence in the arrangement of a room. Chairs and sofas are never placed by rule if a lady has an original mind.

If all the arrangements about her home are complete; if they exhibit order, taste and elegance; if thought has wrought out the aspirations of the heart in the pictures that suggest refinement; if vines training from dainty vases tempt the imagination to perpetual summer; if gleams of sunshine falling here and there on the softly-tinted carpet intimate warmth of feeling—we drop into an easy arm-chair, and a restfulness creeps over us.

The plain cottage, with its low ceilings and diminutive windows, may be a very ideal of poetic fancy. Indeed the rich have all the appurtenances of wealth to make a creation with, while the humble housewife in a little cottage must create and carry out her designs unaided. Rugged exteriors must be toned down to beautiful conceptions, and then poets will sing of love in a cottage, and tried votaries of style will sigh for the love if not for the cottage.—Rural Home.

JONAH OVERBOARD.—Last week the Brooklyn Tabernacle excommunicated a member for conduct disgraceful of the Christian profession. He had long been warned and admonished; but, failing to cease his evil practices, he was by a unanimous vote cut off, and his excommunication as publicly announced as his reception five years before had been published. Brethren of the churches, is it not time that our religious societies be cleaned of their unfaithful members? Will not the world have more respect for the church when it is understood that there is such a thing as Christian discipline, and that a man cannot live an obnoxious life and yet sit at the communion table? Let this cleansing process go on kindly but firmly, and the church will mean more than it does now. The greatest dangers to Christianity to day are not those who are writing against it, but the professors of religion who carry around contribution plates and communion cups, and stand prominent at prayer meetings, while they are known as defrauders, slanderers or inebriates. You wonder why the old gospel ship has such rough weather. It is because you have a Jonah on board. Pick him up and let him drop over the sides very gently, and the sea will cease its raging. It is very hard to do so, but better Jonah go to the bottom than the entire vessel. One rotten apple will spoil the whole barrel.—Christian at Work.

NEVER will there be peace until Christians agree to differ, and agree to look for the evidences of Christian character in the temper and the life.—Channing.

THERE is a terrible significance in the questions we sometimes ask upon the death of a wealthy man, if we only understood the real significance of the questions. "How much was he worth?" we ask. And the angels might reply: "Worth? He wasn't worth anything. His money was worth something. His body is worth something as a source of fertility to the soil. But he wasn't worth anything." So we vary the question: "Yes: but how much did he leave?" "Oh, leave?" it might be answered. "Yes; I will tell you. He had houses, lots, bonds, stocks, gold, notes, merchandise, farms. And he left—great God! he left them all." Bringing nothing into the world, man carries nothing out of it, and so, if his whole soul has been consecrated to things of this life, how dark indeed is his entrance upon the never-ending eternity to which we are all hastening.

BE NOT afraid of men; your Master can mow down his enemies, and make withered hay of fair flowers.

FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, NEW YORK.—Among the varied attractions offered to visitors to the great city of New York there is nothing which strikes the stranger with more pleasant surprise, and we may say amazement, than the wonder of her hotels. Such are not to be found in any other part of the world. Not only the splendor and vastness of the buildings and costliness of the furniture and equipments, which surpass in their luxuriousness the palaces of the kings, but the almost endless variety of viands, of every domestic production and imported from all parts of the globe, make up bills of fare equal to the demands of the most capricious appetites, and at the same time afford food for reflection upon the skill, enterprise and indomitable energy of those men and companies who erect and conduct them. Messrs. Darling, Griswold & Co., proprietors of the Fifth Avenue, located at 198 Fifth avenue, are in the front rank of such enterprise. Their house is supplied with all the modern improvements and conveniences, and it seems to us that nothing is wanting that a guest could desire.

STONINGTON LINE, BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON.—The readers of the ADVOCATE visiting Boston this summer will find the above line the most desirable route leaving New York. There are two departures in the day, one boat leaving Pier 23, East river, in the morning, and reaching Boston in season for a good night's rest. The other leaves at five o'clock, from Pier 31, North river, reaching Boston at six A. M. These steamers are among the largest, fastest and most elegant afloat, having all the modern conveniences and appliances for safety and comfort. Those who are seeking pleasure, and prefer the morning boat, will have an opportunity to enjoy a delightful inland sea voyage by daylight, and to avoid the suffocating dust of the cars. This line has no equal for promptness, dispatch and safety among the lines to Boston. It is presided over by D. S. Babcock, and Mr. E. A. Bevean is the efficient agent of the company.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, ASHLAND, VIRGINIA.—We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of the above-named institution. Rev. James A. Duncan, A. M., D. D., president. This noble institution will open its next session on the last Thursday in September, 1874. The name of President Duncan is a tower of strength, and Randolph Macon is a name of which the whole Church South is proud.

BATON ROUGE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE FOR BOYS.—The above-named institution is under the management of Prof. W. H. N. Magruder, the principal and proprietor, who is one of the most thorough scholars and eminent teachers in this country, and the claims of the institute are modestly stated when we say that it has but few equals in any country. Our readers will find in this issue the notice of the opening of the fall session.

FEMALE COLLEGE, GREENSBORO, ALA.—The advertisement of the above-named institution appears in this issue of the ADVOCATE. It is located in a pleasant and intelligent community. Social influences, as far as they can affect a school will conserve the moral and religious principles and refined literary tastes of the pupils.

E. E. F. ROSS, ESQ., connected for several years with the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, is now making a tour through the West and North on business connected with the office. He will confer freely with our patrons and agents in the different cities in regard to our mutual interests, and we bespeak for him the courtesies which have been so liberally extended heretofore, and which we have not forgotten.

A. C. LITTLEJOHN, ESQ., is our sole agent for the State of Texas. We commend him to the courtesies of our friends having advertisements for insertion or other business to transact with the ADVOCATE.

THE demand for the Halford Leicestershire Table Sauce, by guests who best understand how to make most palatable their soups, fish and meats, induces all the best hotel proprietors in the country to place it constantly upon their tables. jy23 4t

MEDICAL DISCOVERY
OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, HAS discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,
FROM
The Worst Scrofula Down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder-humor.) He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of Pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst Canker in the mouth or stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One to two bottles are warranted to cure all Humor in the Eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the Ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corrupt and running Ulcers.

One bottle will cure scaly eruption of the Skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of Rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure Salt Rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of Scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

ROXBURY, MASS.

DEAR MADAM: The reputation of the Medical Discovery in curing all kinds of Humors is so well established, by the unanimous voice of all who have ever used it, that I need not say anything on the subject, as the most skillful physicians and the most careful druggists in the country are unanimous in its praise.

In presenting the Medical Discovery to your notice, I do it with a full knowledge of its curative power in relieving all, and curing most of those diseases to which you are unfortunately so liable. That most excruciating disease to an affectionate mother,

Nursing Sore Mouth,

is cured as if by a miracle. Your own temper is restored to its natural sweetness, and your babe from short and fretful naps to calm and sweet slumbers; and the Medical Discovery becomes a fountain of blessing to your husband and household. In the more advanced stages of

Canker

it extends to the stomach, causing

Dyspepsia,

which is nothing but canker in the stomach; then to the intestines and

Kidneys,

creating a sinking, gone feeling, and an indifference even to the cares of your family. Your stomach is

Raw and Inflamed,

your food distresses you, and you can only take certain kinds, and even of that your system does not get half the nourishment it contains, as the nutritious fluid of the canker eats it up; then your complexion loses its bloom and becomes sallow or greenish, and your best day is gone. For want of nourishment your system becomes loose and flabby, and the fibers of your body become relaxed. Then follow a train of diseases which the Medical Discovery is peculiarly adapted to

Cure:

Palpitation of the heart, pain in the side, weakness of the spine and small of the back, pain of the hip-joint when you retire, irregularity of the bowels, and also that most excruciating of diseases,

The Piles.

How many thousands of poor women are suffering from this disease and pining away a miserable life, and their next-door neighbor does not know the cause. I wish to impress on your mind that good old proverb: "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." In you have both the preventive and the cure, with this great and good quality: that it will never, under any circumstances, do you any injury.

THE MEDICAL DISCOVERY

No change of diet is ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it.

DIRECTIONS FOR USE.—Adults, one tablespoonful per day; children over ten years, dessertspoonful; children from five to eight years, teaspoonful. As no directions can be applicable to all constitutions, take sufficient to operate on the bowels twice a day. Yours truly, au11 1y DONALD KENNEDY.

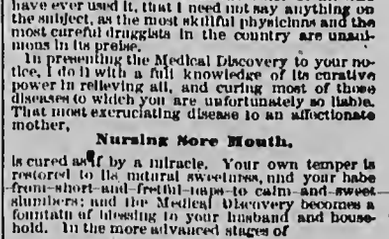
Price $1 80 per bottle. For sale by all druggists.



THE BEST ADVICE THAT CAN BE given to persons suffering from

DYSPEPSIA, BILIOUS COMPLAINTS

CONSTIPATION, COLIC, SICK HEADACHE,

Fever and Ague, Nervous Debility,

or of any disorder of the Stomach, Liver or Kidneys, is to tone, cleanse and regulate them by the use of Dr. Tutt's Vegetable Liver Pills.

They act very mildly, yet thoroughly restore the functional action of the Digestive Organs and the Intestines, and renovate the whole system, imparting a good appetite and healthy assimilation of food. They produce neither Nausea, Griping nor Debility, and may be taken at any time, without change of diet or occupation.

Price, 25 cents a box. Sold by all druggists.

Dr. Tutt's Hair Dye

possesses qualities that no other dye does. Its effect is instantaneous, and is so natural that it cannot be detected by the closest observer. Being harmless and easily applied, it is in general use among the fashionable Hair-Dressers in every large city in the United States. Price, $1 a box. Sold everywhere.

The Child's Corner.

THE BABY THAT CAME FROM A STAR.

"Mamma," said three-year-old Charlie, "I think my new little sister must have been blown down from a star by that high wind last night; don't you?" This remark actually was made by a child.

Last night, while I was sleeping,
My new little sister flew
Right out of that beautiful star overhead
Into her cradle new.

"Funny that the cradle was there
Just ready for her," you say;
I think mamma must have had an idea
The wind was blowing this way.

I know she came from a star, because
Last night when I went to bed
The north wind was blowing very hard,
And a bright star overhead

Seemed twinkling, twinkling down at me,
As if it wanted to say:
"Baby boy, see what I'll send to you Before the break of day."

Beautiful star, kind little star,
How good to let her go;
I wonder if you did it because
I wanted a sister so.

I wonder if the wind blew her because
I prayed to God last night:
"Dear Lord, you have up in your heavenly home
Two little angels bright,

"Who once belonged to mamma and me.
O please, could you not spare
A little sister to stay and live,
And not be wanted up there?"

I wish my sister could hurry and speak,
And tell me how she grew;
I wonder if the wind brought her down
In that basket lined with blue.

I wonder if the stars said good-by;
And so the wonder grew.
Little sister, when you begin to talk
You must tell him the story true.

About Pearls.

The pearl is a very beautiful as well as costly ornament, and is much prized as an article of jewelry. There have been several theories advanced in regard to the formation of the pearl, but none are quite satisfactory. This is one of the mysteries that nature has kept hidden from us. The ocean and the mountains are her workshops; the latter men have excavated and tunneled, until they have discovered many things not before thought of; but she reigns securely in the deep, blue sea. Many treasures are stored "far down in the green and glassy brine," but few are venturesome enough to fathom the depths and bear away the rich spoil. It is very dangerous work, for, although we have now the diving-bell, making it possible for men to stay under the water for some time, they suffer if they go down very often or stay long. But some enterprises are attended with danger, and not all are as profitable as the pearl fishery.

The divers are provided with bags in which to put the shells taken from the bottom of the ocean. These are then broken open, and the pearls drilled and strung. Black people are generally employed for this purpose, as they are very expert; but, although they are very carefully watched, they sometimes succeed in secreting a valuable pearl.

The best fishery in the East is near the Isle of Ceylon, where the season commences in February and lasts until April. A gun is fired as a signal for the boats. All go out and come back together.

Twenty men go in each boat, ten of whom are divers; the remainder row the boat and assist their companions in reascending. They go out at sunrise, remain busily engaged until noon, when they return and are relieved of their precious cargo, and are ready for another trip. This is the way that the pearls that people highly prize are obtained.

Pearls possess an advantage over precious stones taken from rocks in that they are found with that appearance which gives them their value. They are perfectly polished and finished before they are taken from their ocean home, while stones obtained from the different kinds of rocks need cutting and polishing before they are fit for use of the jeweler. Nature gives them their rough form, and leaves it to art to give it the finishing touches.

White pearls are most prized, although some persons prefer those delicately tinted. The Oriental pearls are the finest, on account of largeness and beauty; they are of a silvery white.

Pearls have been used as ornaments from the earliest ages, and among all nations. Even the Indians esteemed them before the discovery of America, for when the Spaniards first came over they found quantities of them stored away; but they were inferior, being of a yellowish shade, because the Indians used fire to open the shells. Cortes describes Montezuma, the Mexican Emperor, at their first interview (1517,) as wearing garments embroidered with pearls, and the natives also wore necklaces and bracelets of them.

Will our young readers find for themselves what is said about pearls in the Bible, and especially about one "pearl of great price?"—New York Observer.

Rub Up Your Armor.

One might almost suppose, by the advice now given you, that I had taken my young friends to be old soldiers; but that is by no means the case—far otherwise. As I doubt not you read your Bibles, no doubt you are lovers of peace; at least I hope so, for little good can be reasonably expected from war. Were you to ask Old Humphrey, "What is war?" his reply would be:

"'Tis made of sin in all its parts,
And battered heads and bleeding hearts;
Remorse, and bitter grief and fears,
And widows' wails and orphans' tears."

Promote peace, and practice kindness and forbearance and forgiveness and love toward one another.

We have heard much of the honor and glory of war; but the glory of it is to the few, and the gloom of it is to the many. But now to my motto: "Rub up your armor."

You have read, I dare say, of the exploits of knights-errant in olden times, and of the way in which they clothed themselves for their encounters; but, as you may not have a distinct remembrance of their warlike dress, I will give you a list of the several parts of a suit of armor.

First come the steel clogs; then the greaves, or shin-pieces; then the cuisses, or thigh-pieces; next the breach mail; the waist-pieces; and the cuirass, or breast-plate. Now come the lower arm-covers; rerebaces for the rest of the arms to the shoulders; gauntlets, or iron gloves for the hands, and a helmet for the head. There are, besides, a dagger, a short cloak worn over the armor, a bacinet, a lance, a long sword and a shield.

After what I have said on the subject of war, you will hardly expect that my motto, "Rub up your armor," has anything to do with such armor as this.

The word of God says much about the practice of love and kindness and forbearance, and forgiveness of injuries, and doing good for evil, and meekness and lowliness and humility; but if there be a verse that tells a Christian to go to war, or that says a single word about the duty of revenging an injury or an insult, it has altogether escaped my attention.

If you had to fight with armed men it would be necessary to suit your armor to the occasion; but your enemies are of another kind. Rub up your armor, then, and mind that you wear it inside; for inside armor is stronger than outside armor ten times told. He that has a good cause and a good conscience is safer than Goliath was in his coat of mail, weighing, as it did, five thousand shekels.

Rub up your Christian graces, for these are the armor I wish you to wear. Put on humility, meekness, forbearance, forgiveness, temperance, knowledge, watchfulness, prayer, contentment, thankfulness, faith, hope, love and zeal. When once well arrayed in these, you will be armed in complete armor from head to heel; for humility and meekness will defend you from the vanity, pride and ambition that lead so many astray; patience, forbearance, forgiveness will protect you from anger, bitterness, revenge and remorse; temperance will keep you from excess; knowledge will defend you from the errors of ignorance; watchfulness and prayer from the seductions of pleasure and temptation; contentment and thankfulness from ingratitude and repining; faith and hope from doubts and fears; love from negligence in keeping God's commandments and hatred of those around you, and zeal from guilty slothfulness in holy things.

Though I have now perhaps written enough, I will finish my remarks with the suit of Christian armor so admirably described by the Apostle Paul, for as Bible readers you ought to know, and I trust you do know, that the best rules laid down by men for our spiritual welfare are laid down a thousand times better in the blessed book of truth: "Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and, having done all, to stand. Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit."—Ephesians vi, 13-18.—Juvenile Instructor.

QUEER TALKING.—You boys and girls, just before the shirt-collar and back-hair age, manage to twist words in a comical way. Often I have a good time listening to the wee folk who come to our meadow.

One day a little girl, seeing, in the last part of one of her Christmas books, that a sequel to it would soon be published, called out to a playmate: "O Kitty! isn't this nice? My new book's got a squeal to it!"

But she was quite accurate compared with a little bit of a boy who came to the creek with some other children, one day last summer, to look for water cresses.

"I'm goin' to take a awful lot o' cresses home to mamma," he said, trudging along as briskly as his fat little legs would allow, "'cause my mamma's got a fidgelator, what 'll keep everything as cold as ice, to put 'em in. Your mamma got one?"

"No, she ain't," answered a tow-headed little chap; "but she's got a steel egg-beater!"

"No! An egg-beater!" shouted my wee youngster, turning squarely about to look at the speaker. "What's that for?"

"Why, to beat eggs with, you goosey!"

"Ho!" screeched the little chap in great scorn. "She'd better look out! If she goes to beatin' eggs she'll break 'em. Eggs is brittier than anything. Guess you 'most don't know what you're talkin' 'bout!"—St. Nicholas.

"I AM THE DOOR."—In a town in the north of Scotland some boys were in the habit of meeting together for prayer. A little girl was passing and heard them sing. She stopped to listen, and, thinking it was just an ordinary prayer meeting, she felt anxious to get in. Putting up her hand, she pulled the latch, but it would not open; it was fastened inside. She became very uneasy, and the thought arose in her mind: "What if this were the door of heaven and me outside?" She went home, but could not sleep. Day after day she became more troubled at the thought of being shut out of heaven. She went from one prayer meeting to another, still finding no rest. At length one day, reading the tenth chapter of John, she came to the words: "I am the door." She paused and read the verse again and again. Here was the very door she was seeking, and wide open too, and she entered it and found peace.

"PAY GOD FIRST."—"Father," cried Johnny, running to where his father was hoeing, "a lady gave me this for the bunch of flowers I picked on my way home," and his chubby face was glowing with delight.

"What are you going to do with it, Johnny?" asked his father.

"First thing, I shall take some for Jesus," said Johnny. "Half of it will go right into my give-away box."

"Right, Johnny," cried his father; "pay God first."

Farm, Garden and Household.

SEED POTATOES AND FERTILIZERS. Mr. E. H. Judd, of South Hadley, Massachusetts, in an essay read before the Franklin Harvest Club, said: "After experimenting with most kinds of fertilizers and methods of planting and cultivating the potato, I have solved the problem to my satisfaction. I am confident that the best results can be obtained on the majority of our soils by first plowing, then thoroughly pulverizing and drilling at least five inches deep. Then apply in drill manure of first quality at the rate of five cords per acre, after dropping the seed in bottom of drill, the manure to be put top of seed, and only leaving one eye on a piece, and putting only one piece in a hill. Having tried different-sized tubers, I am satisfied that the larger the potato you use for seed the greater will be the returns. Two different years I have experimented by cutting my potatoes into pieces, leaving only one eye on a piece, and putting only one piece in a hill, with the following results: In the spring of 1868 I took one bushel of potatoes and cut them into pieces, leaving only one eye on a piece, and planted them one piece in a hill. They went over nearly one-third of an acre. The following fall I harvested from that field one hundred and five bushels of merchantable potatoes. I have since tried the experiment of putting in two eyes, but have diminished the yield nearly one-third."

GROWTH OF TREES.—There having been considerable discussion among correspondents of the Tribune (New York) as to whether there is a lengthening of the trunk of trees in their growth, Prof. Asa Gray, the best authority on vegetable physiology in the country, says they do not, and gives, in a late contribution to that journal, several instances to prove that such is the case. But in order to test the question more satisfactorily, he writes that he has selected three young trees of different sorts and sizes, but all small and thrifty, into each of which he has driven four broad-headed copper tacks in a vertical line four inches apart, short transverse lines being cut upon each tack to mark exactly the boundaries of each four inches of the whole foot. Next autumn he proposes to have these distances carefully measured, the results of which are to be made public. And, that others may contribute to the solution of this interesting question (about which there is such a diversity of opinion,) he hopes many others will institute corresponding experiments, taking pains to measure all the distances very exactly, and to see that the tacks are long enough to penetrate at least the last year's layer of wood.

HOW TO COOK BEEFSTEAK.—Some time since a complete encyclopedia of useful knowledge in human form became an inmate of a family. When this learned guest came among them he was consulted as an oracle in many cases, and was asked one morning: "Would he tell or show them a better way to cook the steak for breakfast?" He took the thin, long-handled frying-pan from its nail, and, putting it on the stove, heated it quite hot. In this he put the pieces of steak, previously pounded, but, to their surprise, did not put a particle of butter in the frying-pan, and did not salt his steak. He allowed the steak to merely glaze over, and then turned it quickly to the other side, turning it several times in this manner until it was done. Four minutes were not employed on the operation, but a juicier piece of steak was never eaten. It was, when done, laid on the platter, previously warmed, and was buttered and salted and set a moment in the hot oven. Allowing the steak to heat but a moment on each side helped it to retain all its sweet juices, and putting on the salt the last moment after it was on the platter drew out its juices.

CANNING OF VEGETABLES.—The chemical bath in which the cans of vegetables are immersed before their final sealing is used only for the purpose of getting a temperature higher than the boiling point of water. The necessity for this high temperature is due to the fact that the air contained in the can and its contents is more thoroughly expelled, and if the can is entirely void of air there can be no change in the condition of its contents. A boiling heat will expel all the air, but longer time is needed than with a higher temperature. For domestic purposes the bath of boiling water is sufficient. It is only necessary to cook vegetables (without salt) in the can, to solder the cover on perfectly air-tight, to make a pin-hole in the cover, and then immerse the can in a boiling water bath without covering the upper parts, and, when it has been exposed to the boiling heat for fifteen minutes, to seal with a drop of solder upon the pin-hole.

BARREN FIG-TREES.—There are a great many fig-trees all over the State that will bear two and three crops of figs each year, but will drop off when half grown. Nothing will make such trees bear, let them grow where they will, and almost every one that has such trees thinks they cannot be grafted. But they can, and budded too. Have to graft on the small limbs all over the top of the tree. Will not grow to saw off a large limb to graft. The best time to graft the fig is from the first of February to the twenty-fifth. Last March I set some fig-grafts on one of my trees; part of them grew well; more would have grown if I had set them earlier. Some of the grafts grew over four feet. Last fall I picked ripe figs from these grafts; also where the grafts don't grow there will be young shoots growing that can be budded in the summer.—F. Ritter, in Pacific Rural Press.

CLOTHES which are put into boiling water when washed will certainly become yellow. They should be allowed to come to a boil slowly and boil twenty minutes.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE NEXT TERM OF THIS VENERABLE INSTITUTION OPENS ON THE FIRST MONDAY IN OCTOBER, 1874.

Faculty.—REV. C. G. ANDREWS, A. M., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Political Economy and International Law; REV. A. R. HOLCOMBE, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Adjunct Professor of Natural Science; C. H. WILEY, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages; T. S. JONES, M. D., Professor of Natural Science; REV. H. D. NORSWORTHY, A. M., Principal of the Preparatory Department.

Charges.—Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in College, $60; Tuition, per session of forty weeks, in Preparatory Department, $30; Contingent expenses, $5. A matriculation fee of $5 must be paid on entering any regular college class. One-half the charges must be paid when the student enters; the other half on the beginning of the second term, March 1.

Board.—Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be had in the best families for $20 per month. Day-boarding with the same families, $12 per month. Rooms provided in the dormitories free of rent. Board to be paid in advance at least one month.

Location.—This institution is located in the lovely village of Jackson, about twelve miles from Bayou Sara, in a grove of pine, magnolia, oak and beech. The location is remarkable for its beautiful woodlands, its bland and delightful atmosphere, its pure water, its unrivaled healthfulness, and its cultivated and refined society.

When Founded.—The college was established by the State of Louisiana in 1825, and ceded to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845.

Alumni.—Its Alumni numbers two hundred and three, and they are to be found in the most honorable and useful stations in the land.

Apparatus and Cabinet.—The college possesses a valuable set of Philosophical, Astronomical and Chemical Apparatus, and also a well-selected Mineralogical and Geological Cabinet. The apparatus includes a Theodolite, Sextant, Compass, Chronometer, Atwood's Machine, Whirling Tables, Electrical Machine, Air Pump, various combinations of the Mechanical Powers, Batteries, Chemical Tests, etc., sufficient for a thorough and extended course of observations and experiments. Steps have been taken by the Board of Trustees to put these in thorough repair.

Literary Societies.—There are two regular Literary Societies connected with the Institution. These are of great utility to young men acquiring a liberal education—improving them in the art of public speaking, making them in some degree familiar with the proceedings of deliberative bodies, and in cultivating systematic business habits. Each Society has a convenient hall and a well-selected Library—about one thousand six hundred volumes each, which, added to the College Library of two thousand volumes, makes over five thousand volumes in the college.

Buildings.—The Trustees are determined to continue the repairs on the buildings till completed. The grand Center Building is a noble specimen of architectural beauty and adaptation to the purposes of its erection. The wings, built of solid brick, present each a front of two hundred feet, with upper and lower galleries the entire length, supported by Tuscan columns, and with the center making in the perspective a continuous front of seven hundred feet.

Preparatory Department.—In the Preparatory Department students are fitted for regular college classes, or may obtain a thorough English or commercial education.

The Faculty.—Its Faculty are men of experience and success in teaching.

Board of Trustees.—Rev. Bishop J. C. KEENER, D. D., President, New Orleans.

WESLEYAN FEMALE INSTITUTE,

STAUNTON, VIRGINIA,

will begin its Twenty-fifth Annual Session SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

REV. W. A. HARRIS, D. D., President, with an able corps of twenty-three teachers and officers. Modern languages taught and spoken by European teachers. Music by seven professors and teachers, among whom are two of the most cultivated teachers of vocal music in the South.

This is one of the healthiest climates in the world. Its marked effect is the rapid promotion of the physical health and vigor of our pupils. Those who come here from the South, with feeble constitutions, chills and climatic diseases, are entirely restored.

Buildings elegant, fanned by the purest breezes, and commanding the most magnificent rural and mountain scenery, making it one of the most delightful college homes in the Union.

The last session one hundred and eleven young ladies attended this school, as boarding pupils, from fifteen Southern States.

Extracts from Testimonials.

From Bishop D. S. Doggett, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, located in Staunton, Virginia, under the presidency of Rev. W. A. Harris, is, in my judgment, one of the best institutions for young ladies in the South. I have occasion to know and appreciate its value by the advantages enjoyed by some of my daughters, now a pupil there. It possesses all the facilities of a thorough female education. Its personal accommodations are all that can be desired for health and comfort or taste. No location could be more eligible, no scenery more magnificent, no atmosphere more salubrious. It is now in a state of great prosperity. I do not hesitate to recommend it to the patronage of all who wish their daughters to receive the benefits of a useful and ornamental culture.

D. S. DOGGETT.

From Bishop E. M. Marvin, D. D.

The Wesleyan Female Institute is an honor to the church. Instruction is thorough. All classes stand high. Its music advantages are offered of a very high order. The most talented professors are employed, and neither pains nor expense are spared to make this department eminent. The school is very prosperous, and deserves to be so.

E. M. MARVIN.

From Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

The Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, deserves the brilliant success it enjoys. It has a good corps of teachers, a beautiful situation and excellent management. Having had a daughter under Mr. Harris' care during the present session, my observation leads me to believe this school to be one of the best of female seminaries which adorn our State. FRANCIS H. SMITH.

MARTHA WASHINGTON COLLEGE,

ABINGDON, VA.

R. W. JONES, M. A., University of Virginia, President, with a full and skillful Faculty for instruction in all branches taught in the best female colleges. The next session begins SEPTEMBER 17, 1874.

Charge for board and tuition, for entire session of forty weeks, half in advance, $220. Other charges moderate.

The surrounding mountain scenery is grand, the buildings commodious and elegant, the grounds incomparably beautiful.

The patronage for last session represented twelve Southern and Western States and England.

Domestic department under the supervision of the President and wife. Healthfulness unsurpassed.

Opinions of Distinguished Patrons and Friends.

Prof. F. H. Smith, M. A., LL. D., University of Virginia.

"I confided to the care of the President, during the present session, two of my daughters, with very sanguine hopes of their improvement in health and culture. My expectations have been more than realized. From experience, then, as well as prepossession, I cordially and confidently recommend Martha Washington College to parents who are seeking the best advantages for their daughters."

Prof. L. C. Garland, LL. D., University of Mississippi.

"Martha Washington College possesses remarkable advantages as a seat of learning. * * * The corps of instruction is composed of ladies and gentlemen of ability, fidelity and professional skill."

Bishop H. N. McTyeire, D. D.

"If I were to search the land around I know not another Abingdon—beautiful for situation, healthful, accessible. Its social atmosphere is of the right sort for a female school—salubrious, not fast, conservative, well toned. The perfume of the "Old Virginia" lingers about it still. Your immediate site, your grounds, please me more than any I have seen. Your shade-trees and your walks and your wide piazzas linger in my mind."

Faculty of the University of Virginia.

"We cordially recommend Major R. W. Jones, a Master of Arts of this institution, as a gentleman peculiarly well fitted by capacity, culture and experience for the conduct of an advanced seminary for young ladies."

For catalogue, etc., apply to the President. jy23 2m

Scientific.

AN English technical periodical points out an easy way of testing whether water is good and fit for general use. It says: "Good water should be free from color, unpleasant odor and taste, and should quickly afford a lather with a small portion of soap. If half a pint of the water be placed in a perfectly clean, colorless glass-stoppered bottle, a few grains of the best white lump sugar added, and the bottle freely exposed to the daylight in the window of a warm room, the liquid should not become turbid, even after exposure for a week or ten days. If the water becomes turbid it is open to the grave suspicion of sewage contamination, but if it remains clear it is almost certainly safe. We owe to Heisch this simple, valuable but hitherto strangely-neglected test."

DEEP-SEA WAVES.—We are indebted to the Boston Journal of Chemistry for the following information concerning the dimensions of deep-sea waves. According to careful investigations, the longest sea-waves observed appear to have been a little more than two hundred yards in length, with a period of about eleven seconds. The highest regular sea-waves accurately observed appear to have had a height of not more than forty feet. The highest waves are generally very long, but for that very reason they are not the steepest. It is believed that the greatest slope of the external surface of a wave in the open sea never reaches thirty degrees, and seldom exceeds fifteen. It is possible that in a storm there may be short portions of wave-surface exceptionally steep, as the result of superimposed waves, and these may be very dangerous to boats; but they do not occur at all in simple swells, nor do they determine the slope of the large underlying wave from which a ship receives its motion. Moreover, the vessel's own depth carries it below the surface-wave, and the mean effective wave acting upon the ship is always less steep, especially in the case of short waves, than in the surface-wave. From these facts we see that the well-known waves which "run mountain high" have their existence only in the imagination of the poet.

INSECT TACTICS.—Insects do not rely entirely on the sting and the jaw for the purposes of warfare. Some wear, as we know, armor; but it is supposed that others dazzle the eyes of their enemies or prey with the brilliancy of their colors; certainly some secure away children and nurse maids by their ugliness. Others imitate death, when touched, with such perfect success as to deceive both the collector and the bird. Others elude capture by the fitness of their color to the place they live in, or the peculiarity of their shape, which makes them resemble leaves, twigs or pebbles. The dung beetle will sham dead capitally. It is said that rooks will not eat them unless alive; the presence of mind of these insects is thus remarkable, which leads them to stick out their legs and stiffen themselves when their great black enemy hops up and investigates. But some beetles show fight and struggle hard. Any one who has caught a cock-chafer knows how it fights and wrestles in the hand, and with what tremendous strength it will force itself out between the fingers. The earwig, too, makes a great display of the nippers at the end of his tail; but they are more formidable than effective, the nip from them being anything but severe for an insect. But about beetles, commend me for military effect to the famous "Bombardier," as it is called, which defends itself with a report and a little puff of smoke, banging away at its enemy like a gunboat, up to twenty rounds. A full account of this natural artillery is given in Kirby and Spence.—People's Magazine.

THE RIVER that runs slow, and creeps by the banks, and begs leave of every turf of grass to let it pass, is drawn into little hollows, and spreads itself in smaller portions, and dies with diversion; but when it runs with vigorousness and a full stream, and breaks down every obstacle, making it even as its own brow, it stays not to be tempted with little avocations, and to creep into holes, but runs into the sea through full and useful channels. So is a man's prayer; if he moves upon the feet of an abated appetite, it wanders into the society of every trifling accident, and stays at the corners of the fancy, and talks with every object it meets, and cannot arrive at heaven; but when it is carried upon the wings of passion and strong desire, a swift motion and a hungry appetite, it passes on through all the intermediate regions of clouds, and stays not until it dwell at the foot of the throne, where mercy sits, and thence sends holy showers of refreshment. Jeremy Taylor.

"HERE'S your nice roast chicken," cried an aged colored man, as the cars stopped at a North Carolina railway station. "Here's your nice roast chick'n 'n taters, all nice and hot," holding up his plate and walking the platform. "Where did you get that chicken, uncle?" asked a passenger. Uncle looked at the intruder sharply, and then turned away, crying: "Here's your nice roast chick'n, gentl'm'n, all hot; needn't go in the house for dat." "Where did you get that chicken?" repeated the inquisitive passenger. "Look-a-yer," says uncle, speaking privately, "is you from de Nurf?" "Yes." "Is you a friend ob de cullud man?" "I hope I am." "Den don't you nebber ask me where I got that chick'n agin. Here's yer nice roast chick'n, all hot." The train started.

OUR HOMES.—We should be thankful for our homes—comfortable homes! Our happiness there is not dependent on the brilliancy of the wall paper or the beauty of the chandeliers. There is no more happiness now in the large house than there was in the three small apartments of many days ago. Our homes are our "castles of refuge" from the conflicts and turmoils of our daily life in the world. Praise God day and night for a comfortable home.

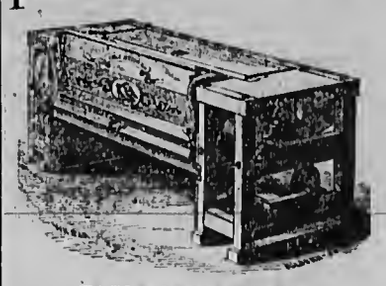
IMPROVED



EAGLE COTTON GINS.

The great popularity of the EAGLE COTTON GINS is established from the well-known fact that they are the most reliable, strongest and best built Cotton Gins ever made. The Eagle Cotton Gin runs lighter than any other gin, thus having a great advantage for planters who wish to run by horse power. All the numerous planters who use the Eagle Cotton Gin will certify to the fact that when their cotton is sent to market it always brings the highest market price, as no other gin can produce a liner or a better sample of cotton than the Eagle Cotton Gins. Over seventeen thousand of the Eagle Cotton Gins have been made and sold. During a period of twenty years the undersigned has had the agency of the Eagle Cotton Gin in New Orleans. He has never had a gin returned or rejected out of the immense number sold. The saw cylinders of all the Eagle Cotton Gins are twelve inches in diameter, which is two inches larger than most other kinds of gins, thus giving our forty-saw gin more teeth, and they are more than equal to the fifty-saw gins of other makers, who use only a ten-inch cylinder, and the same great advantage of the twelve-inch cylinder in larger-sized gins can be easily estimated. Planters who wish a reliable cotton gin, with an established reputation, can purchase an Eagle Cotton Gin with a certainty that they are not making an untried experiment, but will obtain a cotton gin which is indorsed by the oldest and largest planters in the country as the best in use. A large stock of the Eagle Cotton Gins are always kept on sale in New Orleans, ready for immediate shipment. Planters should be particular to state if they want right or left-hand motion gins.

COTTON.—The following are the arrivals since the thirty-first ultimo:

Louisiana and Mississippi	bales...	561
Mobile		333
Texas		1
Total		895

On Saturday we noticed some inquiry, but mostly from buyers who claimed concessions which factors would not admit, and the sales were confined to 100 bales, taken by one buyer. The dispatches from Liverpool and New York were not calculated to impart any spirit to the demand. On Monday there was some inquiry, but mostly at prices below the views of factors, who were unwilling to give way to the extent claimed. A very fair style of good ordinary sold at 14¾c; strict good ordinary was offered at 15c. The sales embraced 325 bales. On Tuesday buyers came forward with more spirit and took 850 bales, mostly for the North, at irregular and easier prices, but the demand was not general, and the bulk of the business was done by three brokers. There was also some inquiry for kinds which could not be found, or which were held above the limits of the pending orders. Barely ordinary sold at 10¾c., good ordinary at 14¾c., do. on the merits of its staple, at 14¾c., strict good ordinary at 14¾@14¾c., but generally held at 15c; low middling at 15¾c., and strict middling as low as 16¼c. The demand has been so limited that when factors wish to close off small lots they are compelled to make liberal concessions in order to effect sales, while others adhere to their previous pretensions, and buyers often find it difficult to fill orders, unless at outside rates or a fraction higher. Prices consequently have been marked by considerable irregularity, and a wider range than usual.

The above makes an aggregate for the past three days of 1,275 bales, against 900 for the corresponding time last week and 1,250 the week before.

The receipts proper at this port since the first of September, exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas, are 1,214,852 bales, against 1,234,344 bales to the same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 247,749 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is an increase of 110,945 to France, of 115,772 to other foreign ports, and a decrease of 47,162 to Great Britain. We quote:

Inferior	7½ @ 9
Low ordinary	9¾ @ 10¼
Ordinary	11 @ 11½
Strict ordinary	12½ @ 12¾
Good ordinary	14¼ @ 14½
Strict good ordinary	14¾ @ 15
Low middling	15¼ @ 15½
Strict low middling	15½ @ 16¼
Middling	16¼ @ 16¾

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Alphabetically Arranged Under the Heads of the Business or Articles Advertised.

NOTE.—We take no advertisements except from those who we have good reason to believe are respectable and reliable. The publisher urges his solicitor and agents to see the advertisements of the most worthy and reliable representatives in every branch of business, and not to apply to or accept business from persons of doubtful character. We have refused business to the extent of thousands of dollars each year for want of satisfactory information in reference to applicants. We think we may safely claim for the list below that it embraces, as a rule, the very best men and firms in the different branches represented.

GREENSBORO DISTRICT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—The District Conference for this district has been appointed to be held at Ivy Creek church, Antauga county, including the fifth Sunday in August, beginning on Thursday, the twenty seventh. Conveyances will be provided for the delegates at Burnsville, on the Selma, Rome and Dalton railroad, at eight o'clock on Thursday morning. The trains meet at this point daily. It is very desirable that the official members generally attend, and be on hand at the opening service at eleven o'clock on Thursday morning.

A. H. MITCHELL, P. E.

THE Brandon District Conference will be held at Scotland chapel, Neshoba county, Mississippi, August 27, 1874. Those brethren not having private conveyances will notify Rev. W. A. Ray, at Watkinsville, Neshoba county, Mississippi in due time, who will furnish conveyance at Forest on the morning of the twenty-sixth of August. A full attendance is desired, as business of importance will be before the Conference.

F. M. WILLIAMS, P. E.

DELHI DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—The Delhi District Conference will convene at Delhi, Louisiana, September 3, 1874. Rev. B. F. Alexander is appointed to preach the opening sermon.

C. W. CARTER, P. E.

THE Eufaula District Conference, Alabama Conference, will be held at Perote, Alabama, commencing on Wednesday night, August 26. Introductory sermon will be preached by Rev. T. W. Dyer. Members of the Conference will report to Rev. W. S. Turner, at the parsonage, on arriving at Perote.

TO THE SUFFERERS

WITH RHEUMATISM.

In view of the numberless sufferers afflicted with this painful malady, I feel induced to offer to the public my "ANTI-RHEUMATIC MIXTURE," which medicine proves to be the only successful remedy in this line, for it always gives instant relief, and in most cases cures permanently.

During the last fifteen years I have cured thousands of people, in this State and city, of this dreadful disease, with this medicine; and, what astonishes most, the patient recovered by the use of a single bottle of it. This medicine cures nothing but Rheumatism, and should the patient not recover by using the first bottle of it, that patient is not afflicted with Rheumatism at all. This being the first time of making my discovery known to the public after fifteen years of most successful results, I hope the sufferers will take advantage of this rare remedy, and by doing so add their names to the thousands already cured by it.

MEDICAL.

DR. C. M'LANE'S

CELEBRATED

LIVER COMPLAINT,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increase on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder-blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for a rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. M'LANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them A FAIR TRIAL.

P. S. Dealers and Physicians ordering from others than Fleming Bros. will do well to write their orders distinctly, and take none but Dr. C. M'Lane's Liver Pills, prepared by Fleming Bros., Pittsburgh, Pa., the package being full of base imitations. To those wishing to give them a trial, we will forward per mail, post paid, to any part of the United States; one box of Pills for twelve three-cent postage stamps, or one vial of Vermifuge for fourteen three-cent stamps. All orders from Canada must be accompanied by twenty cents extra.

News of the Week.

DOMESTIC.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 5.—The telegraph operator at Aurora, Indiana, reports that the steamer Pat Rogers was burned this morning one mile below Aurora, and about twenty lives were lost, the victims being principally ladies. Further particulars are expected soon.

There are no Southwestern or Southeastern names in the list of the lost by the burning of the Pat Rogers. Both the boat and cargo, the latter consisting of cattle, sheep and hogs, besides cotton, are a total loss. The passenger register and all the books were destroyed. The boat was valued at $60,000.

AURORA, IND., Aug. 5.—The fire on the steamer Pat Rogers originated among the cotton bales in the hinder part of the boat, about six o'clock A. M. The boat was immediately turned for the shore, but became unmanageable. The pilot thinks the tiller rope was cut, and the fire the work of incendiaries. The boat drifted on a sand-bar and grounded. The flames, instead of spreading along the lower deck, at once shot up to the cabin and pilot-house, and then swept across the hurricane deck. The passengers were all aroused and the boats lowered, and many were carried ashore, but others, in their fright, jumped into the water, and those not drowned reached the landing-place after drifting a long time with the current.

There were nearly one hundred people on board the boat, but what proportion of this number is actually lost is not known.

SAN ANTONIO, Aug. 6.—The Concho stage-driver, who came in last night, reports that the Lawrence stage was twice attacked by fifteen Indians at Colorado Crossing, between Jacksboro and Concho, but the stage managed to escape.

On the day previous a company of Rangers had a fight with a party of Indians, fifteen miles from the Crossing, killing six Indians.

The Indians are raiding in force around Fort Griffin, Richardson and Jacksboro.

General McKenzie is preparing a large force to operate against the savages from Concho. A lively time is expected in a few weeks.

NASHVILLE, Aug. 7.—Every ward and all districts here, except the Thirteenth and Thirtieth, have made official returns. Regular Democratic ticket elected by a majority of from 2,000 to 3,000. Judge Cooper, for chancellor, 250 over Brien, and Brien and McLain together 32. Two districts have 3,250 over Brien, and over Brien and McLain together 32. Two districts to be heard from will not change the result either way over 100. The result throughout the State, so far as heard from, is that the Democrats have swept the State and elected their candidates in every county. Knox county gives the Democrats 300 to 900 majority.

ROSNEY, Aug. 7.—Information has been received here that the steamer Henry Ames sunk about one mile below Watterproof. Nothing was saved, and several lives were lost. No particulars have been received.

RALEIGH, Aug. 7.—Democratic gains reported from every part of the State. The State is Democratic by from ten to twenty thousand majority. Seven Democratic Congressmen out of eight, and a Democratic gain of some twenty in the Legislature. There is great rejoicing in the city; speaking in the streets all day, and cannon booming. Wake county Democratic for the first time in fourteen years.

VICKSBURG, Aug. 8.—The Henry Ames had a full trip of about fifteen hundred tons through and three hundred tons way freight, consisting principally of grain, bacon and hay. Sinking was caused by striking a hidden obstruction.
